Szad Story

Farhad Szad has been in the news for a week, July when an Associated Press story reported that the convicted sex offender was being released from a five-year prison term. At the time, corrections officials warned that Szad was still considered dangerous despite his release — specifically that Szad could be violent.

Now Szad was paroled after 10 months in Springfield with his parents.

But the community reacted negatively to corrections officials' decision to give Szad back to the streets. The governor made an announcement in support of the report.

But the California solution didn't put out, either and Szad made a brief stop in Oregon before returning to Vermont last week. He found a home in the state, and support from a church group that helps vulnerable persons. His release has raised the issue of community members and internet commentators who have been making the case that a dangerous convict ought to stay locked up. In an interview with WCCO, Gov. Peter Dummer suggested he'd consider signing a bill that would allow the state to keep sex offenders imprisoned indefinitely if they're considered a danger after serving their sentence. Such a bill would likely face opposition in the house.

But something missing from the conversation, according to Phil Pryor, columnist at the Vermont Post, is that the community doesn't need to be notified. There are no more child predators now than there ever have been," Pryor writes in an O2 Message blog post last Sunday. Sex offenders in Vermont, he argues, reduce risk by being transparent, who have the lowest re-offense rates among violent offenders.

Laurie calls Szad's case "the latest story of gross sexual-transmission, popular hysteria and county government panic." He's the end of the other post at www.vermontpost.com/article/szad.

RARE STONE

I wanted to thank Amy Lilly for the fine article on the design for Landmark College by Edward Driscoll Stone ["Modern Landmark," July 30]. I visited the college a few years ago and had no idea that it was a design by Stone. The aerial perspective view you published is remarkable, as it presents the concept in its entirety and raises a few thoughts for architects like myself to consider. As mentioned, it's apparent that Stone looked south and paid homage to Thomas Jefferson's design for the Lawn on the grounds of the University of Virginia. The defining features of both camps are a large central building fronting a swath of lawn accommodating complementary "pavilions" connected by an interesting colonnade — the latter of which are intended to provide cover from the weather. As with the villa (and stone), it seems as if Stone's design fell from the sky — which is indicative of the midcentury modernist "all-at-once" approach. This begs the question: What do you do with such a thing as this? Over time, I hope that architects, landscape architects, and the users of the Landmark campus will find a way to preserve the ensemble while at the same time make this "Stone" their own.

"M" IS FOR MELANOMA

As a survivor of multiple melanomas, I am surprised to see the promotion of the use of sunscreen to prevent melanoma [WTF: Why does Vermont have such a high incidence of melanoma? July 30]. The jury is out on sunscreen's ability to prevent melanoma. Cover up, don't get bad sunburns. The most useful thing I learned about recognizing melanoma is ABCD. Asymmetrical, B irregular border, C multiple colors, D changing diameter.

Len Berg
PLAINFIELD

Sylvia Dobbs "WTF" column [July 30] seeks to answer the question, "Why does Vermont have such a high incidence of melanoma?" I was and is naïve, however, that no one got to the heart of the matter: the cancer clinic when he states, "Those who regularly spend lots of time in the sun are actually less at risk for melanoma than those who spend their days inside." The mysterious oncologist element that Mr. Dobbs was looking for is this vitamin D deficiency! People who tan (or burn) are more likely to gradually build their vitamin D levels. Plenty of research shows that one of the greatest correlating factors with cancer incidence is vitamin D deficiency. Please send readers to melanoma.com.

Dr. Mercola has reviewed and compiled an incredible amount of research on vitamin D. He writes: "There is scientific evidence you can decrease your risk of cancer by more than half simply by maintaining your vitamin D levels with appropriate sun exposure." He also offers a free one-hour video on how to do that. Our Vermont Institute means that our bodies can only produce vitamin D during the summer months and mostly only from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Could it be that Vermont perhaps has a greater pattern of cloudy days during the summer than other states at the same latitude, making "summer waxes" instead of "keeping your clothes on and your sunscreen handy" as Mr. Dobbs recommends, readers should be encouraged to research the subject, work on a gradual tan and optimize their vitamin D.

Why did we choose Main Street Landing on Burlington's Waterfront?

Actually, it was my friend who discovered One Main Street. We were looking for a great location for a project studio—a place to record some songs. This later evolved into Low Tech Studio, a full scale recording studio. A lot of musicians have made a lot of good music here. I think they have all enjoyed the downtown location, and the fact they're in an old train station—it has a great vibe for recording. Through the years, Main Street Landing has been friendly and flexible, and always ready to work with me on any issues that arose. It's one reason I'm still here. And, of course, being right on the waterfront has been a real pleasure.

Miles to Go

GOV. PETER SHUMLIN is getting serious about mountain state spending on travel. At least, when it comes to other people in state government.

Last Thursday, the Shumlin administration ordered agency and department heads to cut their travel budgets by 10 percent this fiscal year, as the Burlington Free Press' TIRRI HALLERGAARD first reported. Meanwhile, Shumlin's secretary of administration, ALAN ALLEN, told HALLERGAARD he hopes to trim the $6.7-per-mile federal reimbursement rate state employees receive when driving on the job.

In a memo to his underlings, Spaulding wrote that the administration "believes that in many instance departments can accomplish their programmatic responsibilities with less in-state and out-of-state travel."

Shumlin couldn't contain his new fiscal austerity measures — driven by a debt he cut with legislators in May to avoid new taxes — at a triumphant press conference last Thursday.

Instead, he jetted off to D.C. that very day on a taxpayer-financed trip to give a speech — and to raise money for the partisan political group he chairs, the Democratic Governors Association.

According to spokesman ALAN ALLEN, the gov. jetted down to the nation's capital Thursday morning to deliver closing remarks at the United States Agency for International Development's Global Education Summit. He returned to Vermont Thursday night.

"The governor was asked by USAID because he actually knows CONRAD SCHWARTZ, who is speaking, referring to the former USAID education adviser and former first lady of Iowa, whose husband, Tom, happens to serve as secretary of agriculture."

"That is official state business and the state paid for the ticket," Allen says.

Shumlin's earlier $477,942 (That doesn't include the cost of sending his state police security detail along — a tax the administration declines to disclose.)

But education wasn't the only thing on the governor's mind during his back-to-back trip to the Beltway. While there, according to his staff, Shumlin visited and cited a potential donor to the Democratic Governors Association over lunch. Bethesda philanthropist TRACY ANN EVAN.

Shumlin didn't return a call asking context.

Is it common practice for the governor to raise money for the DGA while traveling as the state's ambassador?

"No, it's not common practice," Allen says, adding that it happens "occasionally." "If the state is paying, the trip is official," she explains. "The governor is making the trip only because it's official business. If he has an hour in his schedule, so he did today, a couple hours before the speech, in this case the DGA, dropped a lunch with a philanthropist in the schedule for him."

Typically when the governor travels to DGA events, staff organization fees do the bill work as the case earlier this year when Shumlin took leave of Vermont for the political group's conference in Aspen, Montclair and Maryland.

That arrangement makes sense, given that the DGA's hyper-partisan mission is to raise money for Democratic candidates and elect the hell out of Republicans.

INSTEAD OF ANNOUNCING HIS AUSTERITY MEASURES IN VERMONT, SHUMLIN JETTED OFF TO D.C.

But otherwise, the DGA arranges its go-together around meetings of the non-partisan National Governors Association. In those cases, Allen says, the state pays for Shumlin's and his staff's travel expenses.

NGA meetings are "policy heavy," Allen says, and include "governor-only sessions" that provide the state chiefs "a chance to speak candidly about health care, economic development and other issues." One recent NGA meeting featured a session for officials focused on preparing for natural disasters, which Allen and Shumlin also took staff to DISASTER attended.

But at each of the three NGA trips far which the state paid this year, Shumlin participated in partisan press conferences or fundraising gatherings benefiting the DGA.

The bill to taxpayers? $445,471 to send Shumlin and three staffers to Washington in January. $850 to send him and one staffer to Chicago in June, and $1600 to send him and a staffer to Milwaukee earlier this month.

That's not enough to balance the state budget, to be sure. But surely Shumlin himself could "accomplish his programmatic responsibilities with less in-state and out-of-state travel." Or at least the DGA to contribute to his office when it takes up his time.

Then again, maybe it's easier just to nickel and dime state employees over new cars or coffee.

See No Evil?

Mary Anne Simon isn't the only donor looking to play ball with the Democratic Governors Association.

On Thursday, the Internal Revenue Service released a new fundraising report outlining previously who gave what to the DGA, during the first six months of Shumlin's tenure as governor. In that time, the DGA raised $10.4 million while its counterpart, the Republican Governors Association, raised $22.6 million.

And we're not talking 333 checks here. Because the two organizations raise money for state elections, they don't have to abide by federal fundraising limits — meaning they can take in unlimited contributions from corporations and labor unions.

On Shumlin's watch, the DGA has accepted hundreds of donations in excess of $25,000 from such entities — including many whose priorities seem contrary to the party's.

For instance, how does the guy who tried to shut down Vermont Yankee feel about the $25,000 the DGA received from the Nuclear Energy Institute in April and May? How does the renewable-energy skeptic like the DGA's $25,000 contribution from Exxon Mobil, the $25,000 from Exxon or the $50,000 from the American Petroleum Institute? Not to mention that $25,000 check from the American Coalition for Classic Cars?

Shumlin says he won't accept personal company contributions to his personal campaign account, but under his watch, the DGA has accepted $250,000 from AstraZeneca, $100,000 from Merck and $100,000 from the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America. It could go on and tell you about the $200,000 the DGA took from Wal-Mart, the $75,000 that came from Allen or the $125,000 Shumlin reportedly donated by ILIAS COUS. But should I've probably just been you. Is it's stated here from Shumlin himself.

"We know, this is the way I look at it. While I might pick and choose the donors to 'thank' for Governor," he chairman of the DGA, I represent all governors," Shumlin told us last month. "Therefore, I don't get involved with who the DGA should or shouldn't take money from."

Except when he's courting donors over lunch in D.C. Or mingling with them in Aspen.

Not all Vermonters feel like a their governor's misdeeds in the press from Big Bear? That is, the marriage legislation lobby.

If he's left gubernatorial news in any indication, Vermonters don't apparently see anything wrong with that.

BRICK, tried to harsh the govt's snuff for conspicuously courting drug money. The month before, Shanks placed a call to the executive director of NORML, a pro-legalization group, promising to be a national spokesman for the cause — and asking for a $6000 campaign contribution.

By the end of his reelection fight — if you can call it that — Shanny'd accepted at least $14,000 from groups advocating for the decriminalization or legalization of pot. He even managed to carve out the time to go public to appear at a New York City fundraiser for the Marijuana Policy Project — alongside former talk-show host MONTY WILLIAMS.

The election's response? In two words: Duh, bro.

Brack got involved. Ella's a Duble. Sure enough, Shanks and his legislative allies went to work last winter seeking to decriminalize small amounts of marijuana. They succeeded. And now Shanny is trying it forward.

On September 19 the governor's slated to speak to the Marijuana Policy Project's 30th annual fundraising conference call for the group. Participants must commit to contributing $1000 to $15,000 to pot-keeping club, according to an invitation posted by MPJ executive director BOB KATZ, who apparently calls the group "Katz."

"Would you like to join me for a phone call with Vermont Gov Peter Shanks, a top member of the Marijuana Policy Project, to discuss our strategy for legalizing marijuana nationwide over the next four years?" Katz says in the invite.

Wait a sec. Discussing a strategy for legalizing pot nationwide? Isn't Shanks's official position that he favors decriminalization — not legalization?

"As you know, we just passed the decriminalization law," explains Shanks's legislative liaison, JOANNE PORTER. "We're concentrating on refining some that works and achieving as goals and ideas as to focus on highly addictive drugs like meth and opiates. And we are carefully watching how legislation works in other states before any other possible changes."

High. Cool. But does he support legalization or not?

"At this point, we are looking at how it works in other places and how the decriminalization statute works," Porter says.

But wait, isn't the point of the conference call to spread the legalization gospel to other states — not patently observe how it works? Why would Shanks take part in that kind of strategy now if he didn't back legalization?

"You know he talks to a lot of advocacy groups about different policy positions," Porter explains.

Sure, but you don't see Shanny plotting a nationwide strategy to ban abortion with Janice at the Vermont Alliance for Life Committee, do you?

Shanks's staffers might be squeamish about the call, but MPJ staffers sure aren't. "We're going to be talking about how we're going to bring about an end to marijuana prohibition in the states and nationwide," says MPJ communications director MAYOR TYR. "We've never done one thing like this with a strong governor before."

Kind, bad.

Media Notes

More than eight months after the Vermont Press Bureau decided to just send Shanks' weekly reports, the joint editors of the Starland Herald and Stam-Monster Times Argus has landed a top-notch recruit.

DEAN BUSHMAN, who spent seven years at the Bennington Banner, will join because chief WALTER HUNDELL is Manxweiler after Labor Day. The two will tapcode Shanks' news coverage for the papers.

"The Banner was a great place to get some really solid experience and be exposed to state government on a broad basis," Bushman says. "I've wanted to be up there full time to get my hands dirty."

The Press Bureau's grin is dia. Former's best journalism in the southern Vermont daily back when in a slew of staffers. In an editorial in last Thursday's paper, editor MICHELLE KATZ noted that along with Governor the paper is losing three other reporters and editors this summer: staff writer DAVE WILSON, vice editor ANDREW HANSEN and assistant sports editor AUSTIN GARDNER, who moved up to the Burlington Free Press last month.

Katz said she's hired the Burlington Herald's ANDREW WILSON to replace Gardner and plans to fill the other vacant positions as well.

"I am a firm believer that new faces on the staff and new voices in our news reporting will enliven the Banner's coverage," Katz wrote. "And I'm not just saying that because I'm new here [I've been editor since January]."

Lastly, a hearty congrats to former VT Digger JOHN and Manxweiler native YARON SCHUM, who's been hired to replace JOAN CARPACCIO at Vermont Public Radio's digital reporter since graduating from Northeastern University this summer. Dobbs has been flourishing all over the place — including in this very issue of Seven Days.

Gimme Shelter: In Vermont, Sequestration Leads to Homelessness

BY KEVIN J. KELLEY

A quiet crisis wrought by indiscriminate federal budget cuts may force more than 2000 low-income Vermonters from their homes by the end of the year.

Housing officials plan to remove 774 households from a program that subsidizes rents for many of the state's poorest residents. The cuts have already affected hundreds of Vermonters who had been taking part in what's known as the Section 8 voucher system. No one knows what's become of many of the tenants who have already been turned out.

Under that 76-year-old New Deal initiative that was expanded by President Lyndon Johnson, local housing authorities negotiate with private landlords to set monthly rent payments for families and individuals who meet income-eligibility criteria. In Chittenden County, the cut-off point is pegged at $34,900 a year for a family of three. But most Section 8 households earn much less. The Washington-based Center for Budget and Policy Priorities estimates that the average annual household income for Section 8 tenants nationwide is $12,500.

Section 8 requires tenants to pay between 30 and 40 percent of their incomes for rent; the program covers the difference between that figure and the monthly amount specified in the lease. Vermont did not contribute to the cost of the 6792 vouchers its residents received last year from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development — valued at $49.5 million.

That deal is changing. Due to the across-the-board federal spending cuts known as sequestration, the state's Section 8 allocation has been slashed by $5.5 million, resulting in an 11 percent reduction in the number of vouchers available to Vermonters who don't earn enough money to pay for market-rate housing.

David Wyman, commissioner of the Department for Children and Families, said that 6600 Vermonters, including 9000 children, spent at least one night in state-run shelters last year. The Section 8 cuts mean "the ability to access housing is going to get significantly harder," he said.

HOUSING

Amanda Benson

Translation: more homeless Vermonters. Median monthly rent for an apartment in Chittenden County was $918 in 2010, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. A Section 8 household would have to spend 90 percent of an average income of $12,500 to rent a market value apartment in the Burlington area.

Bill Benoit, a local landlord who rents to many Section 8 tenants, said receiving a voucher "for a single mom with two little kids means she not only loses her housing — she might also lose her kids."

Amanda Benson is one of those mothers with two children currently being forced to vacate a subsidized unit. She tells a complex story involving a partner with drug issues, a ruling by housing officials that he be more out of the apartment and some $1000 owed for rent, lights and gas.

"They pretty much set us up for failure," Benson said of the Section 8 overseers. She received her voucher a year ago, after spending several years on a waiting list. Benson added in an interview in the cluttered Winooski apartment she has to vacate this week: "I was totally honest with them," she said in regard to her increasingly dire circumstances. "So many people lie, but I was totally honest."

Where will she and her two adolescent boys go now? "I don't know," Benson replied. "Maybe put ourselves in storage!"

It's possible Benson and her sons could have remained in their apartment were it not for sequestration. Enforcement of tenant obligations under the federal program has been stepped up in recent months, acknowledges Paul Detman, director of the Burlington Housing Authority, which administers Section 8 in Wisconsin as well as in Burlington. "In the past," he explained, "we'd say, 'You've missed up, but we'll give you another chance.' We're not saying that anymore."

A recent example involves Stachyo Kirkland, the mother of two boys who were charged last month with assaulting a police officer at the family's home at Burlington's 644 North 2nd. "They're trying to take away Section 8," Kirkland cried out following a July 31 court hearing on charges of molesting a public officer, disorderly conduct and resisting arrest. The Kirkland family's case "probably isn't going to end well," remarked Bassette, the owner of the Spring Street apartment that she rents.

Because of the federal cuts, Detman has no choice but to reduce the number of vouchers assigned to his agency — from 829 in 2009 to 699 now. He's eliminated about half of the targeted 150. Recipients of the 343 public housing units his agency operates are not affected by the sequestration.

Not every canceled voucher results in eviction. Some Section 8 tenants die or move out of subsidized housing voluntarily. In most of those cases, vouchers that would normally become available to those on a waiting list are not being issued.

"There used to be hope if you were on the waiting list that you could catch early for a year or so and then move into a Section 8," and Meredith Seaman, a housing advocate at the Champlain Valley Office of Economic Opportunity. "The waiting list is now more than five years, and even then you have little chance of getting a voucher because of the cuts."

Fishes to pay rent or to report an increase in income may cause tenants to lose their Section 8 vouchers, Detman said. Involvement in violent criminal activity or drug dealing is also grounds for eviction, according to the Section 8 households' agreed code of conduct.

Detman secures the news and checks in regularly with the courts and cops to stay on top of relevant cases. Less serious offenses, such as drunk driving, do not result in termination of Section 8 assistance, he pointed out.

Tenants facing eviction get two months to file an appeal, Detman said. They're entitled to an attorney after supplied by Vermont Legal Aid, at hearings over which he presides, the housing administrator added.

What's happening to some Section 8 tenants does not amount to acts of cruelty on the part of the Burlington Housing Authority, commented Bassette, who has been renting subsidized units for 30 years. The landlord described Detman as "the best housing program administrator I've seen," adding, "He has some difficult decisions to make."

What does seem cruel, observed Burlington Housing Authority Section 8 coordinator Janet Green, is the loss of a long-awaited voucher for a family that has been living in shelters or on the

UVM Will Make People Sick to Test an Experimental Cholera Vaccine

BY KEN PICARD

When Carrie Lyon's mother called recently to ask how she was doing, her daughter replied matter-of-factly "Egot cholera!"

To be clear, Lyon isn't sick with cholera, she's going to do so. The 39-year-old physician and assistant professor at the University of Vermont's College of Medicine is one of two principal investigators testing the efficacy of an experimental cholera vaccine. For the next few weeks, Lyon and her co-investigator, Dr. Rich Kirkpatrick, will be administering volunteers for a Phase 3 clinical trial that "challenges" 50 test subjects with Vibrio cholerae, aka the cholera bacterium.

Simply put, 50 Vermonters will get paid up to $3000 each to contract a bad case of cholera.

Or not. Actually, researchers at UVM's Vaccine Testing Center, and their collaborators at the University of Maryland and Cincinnati Children's Hospital Medical Center, expect that only half the participants — those given a placebo — will spread much less on the toilet. The rest, presumably, will be immune to the disease.

Three thousand dollars may not sound like a lot of money to contract an intestinal infection that kills up to 120,000 people annually and sicken three to five million others worldwide who don't have access to clean drinking water. But Lyon emphasizes that the study is actually quite safe. Participants, who range in age from 18 to 65, are rigorously screened for medical conditions such as hepatitis, HIV and bowel disorders that would exclude them from the study. The informed consent form runs 16 pages.

Once selected, subjects get either a single-dose oral vaccine or a placebo, and then return 10- or 90 days later, when they'll be admitted to a segregated unit at Fletcher Allen Health Care. There, they drink a solution containing the cholera pathogen and spend the next 12 days in the hospital under round-the-clock medical supervision.

As Lyon explains, cholera isn't really that deadly; people terribly ill, not so it is communicable from person to person. The disease's biggest danger is the dehydrating effects of its symptoms — diarrhea and vomiting — which can kill in hours. But those problems are easily remedied in a controlled hospital setting, where participants are closely monitored and receive oral solutions or IVs to maintain their fluids and electrolytes. Says Lyon, "I've really not worried that anyone is going to get dehydrated in the hospital."

Philip Petrosillo can attest to that. The 36-year-old Burlington resident has participated in five UVM vaccine trials since 2002, testing vaccines for anthrax, campylobacter, typhoid and dengue. Despite the "well-deserved notoriety of the diseases," Petrosillo means his experiences were all "amazing," and left him feeling "medically healed." In fact, during one, he spent 10 days doing nothing but reading, studying, watching videos and hanging out.

"I've been far sicker from the mental fatigue and colds my daughter brings home from preschool," he says. Petrosillo isn't participating in the current study.

The United States hasn't seen a cholera epidemic in more than 100 years — only in travelers who contracted it elsewhere. To date, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration has not approved the use of any cholera vaccine.

That's a big problem, Lyon explains, especially for American tourists, missionaries and foreign aid workers who travel to cholera-prone regions of the world, as well as to countries that experience sudden outbreaks following a natural disaster, such as earthquake-level Haiti.

Two oral cholera vaccines were developed in the 1950s and used overseas in the 1960s, mostly by international travelers. One was shown to have dwindling effectiveness over time, especially among children under 6. The other proved ineffective in cholera-endemic populations in Indonesia and was discontinued by its manufacturer in 2004.

Now the pharmaceutical company ProVax is paying UVM millions to test a new version of it. According to its website, the California-based drug manufacturer develops vaccines to benefit poor and disenfranchised populations by making them affordable and easily deliverable, regardless of the condition of a country's medical infrastructure or supply chain. Founded in 2007, the company is also conducting clinical trials on vaccines for avian influenza, anthrax and HIV.

Kirkpatrick, who arrived in Burlington in 1998, founded UVM's Vaccine Testing Center two years later. Since then, the center has become one of just a handful of sites around the country capable of conducting these types of trials. Since 2004 the center, and Kirkpatrick, have brought in $104 million to UVM, mostly from pharmaceutical firms, private foundations and government agencies.

What motivates people to volunteer for the studies? Obviously, money is the main attraction, he says. For Petrosillo in 2002, when he was still single and unemployed. Since then, he's earned between $500 and $1000 for each study, and used the extra cash to buy a wedding ring for his wife.

"Most of my friends and family thought I was foolishly forgoing things with my health, but they also gave me props for my sense of adventure," adds Petrosillo, whose father was a doctor and his mother, a nurse. "However, my primary motivation for this way of 'earning' money was, and has remained, the contribution I am making to others for whom the vaccines could be much more life matters of life and health."

One coincidence regarding the upcoming cholera study: Rich Fall, incoming UVM freshman, are assigned a book to read before arriving on campus in the fall. Unbeknownst to vaccine center researchers, this year's choice was the nonfiction The Ghost Map, by Steven Johnson, which recounts the story of how Dr. John Snow discovered the cause of cholera during a London epidemic in 1854. ☐

Beck on BT? Burlington Telecom May Add a Conservative Channel

BY KEVIN J. KELLEY

Will an undoubtedly right-wing television network blaze its way into lapidary left-wing Burlington? It will, if Jeffrey Kaufman, chairman of Burlington Telecom's Cable Advisory Council, gets his way.

Kaufman wants BT to carry TheBlaze, a TV outlet launched last year by Tea Partying talk-show host Glenn Beck. A Burlington physician and a supporter of the Israel Center of Vermont, Kaufman sees TheBlaze as a potential counter to Al Jazeera, an Arab news network that BT has made available to subscribers for the past six years.

Al Jazeera is "disgusting," Kaufman said in an interview last week. He charged that the Qatar-based channel is "spreading Sharia," aka Islamic law, in the United States.

A significant number of conservatives in Burlington might be persuaded to subscribe to BT if the priced-up Beck's TheBlaze, Kaufman suggested. Their addition to the city-owned utility's current set of 4,000 paying customers could possibly cover the cost of making TheBlaze available, he added.

Burlington Telecom general manager Stephen Barracough said talks with TheBlaze about terms are at an early stage. "It may or may not happen," he commented, adding that it probably won't unless TheBlaze agrees to a deal resulting in "no incremental costs" to BT.

The telecom operation has only "hard shed money," Barracough noted, due to its still-provisional financial condition. BT owes the city $6.9 million in unshredded costs and is fighting a suit in federal court filed by Citicorpical, which claims Burlington Telecom owes it $31.5 million in leased equipment.

In addition to whatever rates TheBlaze might want to charge, BT could be required to pay "several thousand dollars" to purchase a special receiver for the network's signal, Barracough said.

Kaufman contends that TheBlaze is offering BT a discounted price. Barracough declined to discuss details of negotiations with Beck's channel, as did Josh Raffel, a spokesman for TheBlaze. But Raffel did write in an email on Monday that TheBlaze has gotten "a lot of customer requests through social media and other platforms" asking that its content be made available through BT.

Vermont, also serves on BT's five-member advisory council but has not been present for the group's brief discussions of TheBlaze, Raffel added.

Kaufman said he already pays to receive TheBlaze through a satellite service. The right-wing messenger also operates a website that attracts 10

No objections have so far been lodged with BT in regard to a potential arrangement with TheBlaze, Barracough said. Randy Ruard, a former activist and member of the Cable Advisory Council, added that none of the group's members have expressed opposition to adding a conservative voice to BT's roster of 250 TV channels.

"I support the efforts to have TheBlaze TV come to Burlington, because I support free speech and believe we should have access to as many political perspectives as possible," Ruard said. Lenore Broutignon, a public-policy backer of conservative causes in million unique visitors a month, according to Raffel. He said figures on Blaze TV's viewership are unavailable because the service is too new to have its audience measured by independent auditors.

Although Kaufman subscribes to TheBlaze, he's not a BT customer. But the chairman of the Cable Advisory Council said he might sign up with Burlington Telecom if it agrees to carry Beck's programming.

Kaufman isn't pushing his cause on the same First Amendment grounds as is Ruard. He said he supports bringing TheBlaze to Burlington in part because its politics jibe with his own. ☐ street. Sequestration is to blame, she said, but added that the state should allocate funds to protect families threatened with losing their homes due to Congress' assault on HUD.

"A lot of the time, families have a lot of supports in place when they're homeless," Green said. "But when they're housed, those supports go away, even though the complexity of their issues has not gone away."

"Instead of watching them become homeless and then spending big amounts to put them up in hotels," Green added, "the state should be helping them now to stay in housing."

She noted that the Shelton administration and Vermont legislators have begun discussing the possibility of shifting or adding money to the state's community housing grant, which currently provides about $870,000 to agencies that provide services to the homeless.

With the Republican-controlled U.S. House refusing to approve additional adjustments for many federal programs, reductions in Section 8 started having an impact a couple of years ago. Bissonette, who owns about 300 rental units in the Burlington area, and he has seen about a dozen of his tenants lose vouchers since then. That's cost him $50,000 in rent and legal fees for eviction proceedings, and Bissonette, who also owns Al's French Fry in South Burlington.

He used to rent almost all of his apartments to subsidized tenants, Bissonette noted. "I've had second- and third-generation Section 8 people living in my buildings," he said. "They've spent their whole lives in the system."

Asked why he specializes in renting to the poor, Bissonette explained, "That's how my business model ran. I grew up in the Old North End, and I'm very conscious of the trials and tribulations people there go through on a daily basis." It is also true that the government is a consistent supplier of tenants and always pays its portion of the rent on time.

Today, Bissonette rents only about 300 of his 500 properties to Section 8 households. "I had to change my business model," he said, citing the reduction in vouchers.

What's happening with Section 8 amounts to "a real crisis that's not been visible," commented David Weinstein, a policy adviser to Sen. Bernie Sanders. Weinstein termed the sequestration approach to deficit reduction "insane, horrible." It serves as "a blunt instrument that's doing a lot of damage to vulnerable people," he said.

The Democratic-controlled Senate Budget Committee on which Sanders sits has voted to rescind the cuts in the Section 8 program, Weinstein noted. But the Republican House is refusing even to discuss such a softening of sequestration, he added.

The current cutbacks in Section 8 and other federal housing programs for low-income Americans are only the start of the projected 10-year sequestration process. The Center for Budget and Policy Priorities estimates that the number of vouchers available to low-income American households will be reduced by about 140,000 this year. And "as long as there are across-the-board cuts," observed Sanders spokesman Michael Briggs, "housing vouchers will continue to be cut." ☐

IN THE PAST, WE'D SAY, 'YOU'VE MESSED UP, BUT WE'LL GIVE YOU ANOTHER CHANCE.' WE'RE NOT SAYING THAT ANYMORE.

Alan L. Lewis, 88, died Tuesday morning, August 6, 2013, at Rutland Regional Medical Center.

Born May 30, 1925, in Rutland, VT, he was son of the late David E. and Helen (Quade) Lewis. Alan was the seventh generation to live at the Lewis Farm in Poultney of former Poultney Public Schools and graduated from Poultney High School class of 1942, having served as class president and band member and played on the varsity basketball team.

He attended Norwich University for one year and served with the United States Marine Corps from 1943 to 1946, serving in the South Pacific and obtaining the rank of Staff Sergeant. Returning from the military he attended Columbia University from 1947 to 1948 and received a BAC in the RSC Building as a tour guide from 1949 to 1948. He was a radio announcer for WBBR in Portsmouth, N.H., and WPMR and WBBR in Poultney, N.H. from 1947 to 1950.

He married Barbara Jean Cline in October (2) 1950. Alan, Barbara and their first son, Mark, returned to Vermont in 1952. Alan worked as a salesperson in the petroleum and glass industry in the greater Burlington area for more than 30 years. Returning to Lewisville Farm in Poultney in 1981, he established the Alan Lewis Real Estate Company, staying very active until he retired in 1998. He was active with the Poultney High School Board, Association past president of the Poultney Chapter of Dorrance, past president of the Poultney Rotary Club, Lewis Region Planning Development Corp. and past trustee of the Poultney Historical Society. He also served the town as justice of the peace and member of the Town of Ctr. Authority.

Alan was very proud of his Poultney heritage, especially the fact that his ancestor Joseph Lewis, served alongside Gen. Ethan Allen at the capture of Fort Ticonderoga and fought at the Battle of Hubbardston. He enjoyed spending time with family, cutting lawns and taking and enjoying his grandchildren. He is survived by his sons David J. Lewis and his wife, Laurie of Burlington and Richard E. Lewis and his wife, Gloria of Colchester; his sister, Margaret L. Hanson of Poultney; grandchildren, Adam, Nathan, Christine, Aaron, Timothy and Brittany Lewis; Brooke Gausport and Aaron Gagnier, great-grandchildren, Hannah and Avery Lewis, Noah and Henry Gausport and Katelyn and Lillian Gagnier, and nephews and nieces. He was predeceased by his wife Barbara and by his sons Mark and David Lewis. Funeral services were held on Monday, August 12, 2013, at 1 p.m. at Robert's Aulon Funeral Home, 156 Helen Ave., Poultney, with the Rev. Robert Mable, pastor of the Orthodox-Episcopalian Church officiating.

Burial followed in Hillsdale Cemetery in Colchester. Memorial contributions may be made to the Poultney Historical Society at 1489 East Main Street, Poultney, VT 05759 or to One to One program at RSCAP Volunteer Center in 6 Court Street, Rutland, VT 05701. Arrangements were under the direction of the Robert's Aulon Funeral Home, robertsaulonfuneralhome.com

World-Renowned Opera Star Yonghoon Lee to Perform in Middlebury

BY AMY LILLY

It is not often that world-renowned opera stars make their way to Vermont. And it's even rarer to see one on the order of acclaimed tenor Yonghoon Lee. Lee has sung the lead roles in the Metropolitan Opera's Don Carlo and Carmen productions of the past few years and will appear there again opposite Anna Netrebko in Il Trovatore in 2005.

And that's just at the Met. The South Korean tenor has sung in virtually every major opera house in the world. Having just returned from a six-week stint down under to the lead in Tosca at the Sydney Opera House, he will head to Vermont this Saturday to lead in a single, mass-see performance: the OPERA COMPANY OF MIDDLEBURY'S 30th Anniversary Theatre Concert.

Lee's local appearance is not as random as it seems. He sang Don José in OCM's first production, Carmen, in 2004 — his first professional gig while he was still a student at Mason College The New School for Music in New York.

This was before Middlebury's THEATRE had been fully renovated, according to artistic director ANDERSON, who distinctly recalls that season's "94-degree heat" and "the 50,000-bus."

The fledgling company, which still produces one opera a year (with a second, semi-staged one added in 2002), had so little money that no prop kuff had been secured by the dress rehearsal in the final scene of Bizet's opera, a crazed and jealous Don José murders Carmen. Lee, Anderson recalls, pulled out a banana, which caused everyone to laugh and broke up the tension.

Lee was making light of a Vermont star that had had a frightening start, he recalls during a phone call from his New York City home. "At the time, I was a student and very poor," he recalls. After arriving in Middlebury, he realized that he had misread the contract. He would be paid $500 net for each of those performances but for all those "I didn't know that," he recalls solemnly. "We have to eat."

But the experience was worth it, Lee says. "For the person: How wonderful to perform onstage, even if a small stage. It made me so happy. I can communicate with people and make them happy."

Later that year, Lee returned to Middlebury to sing a solo concert that included the aria "Benedictus amenem" from Tosca. Anderson and OCM's board members were so bowled over by his rendition that they chose the Puccini warhorse for their 2005 production to Lee could sing Cavendish (YouTube videos of Lee more recently performing "Benedictus" and other now signature arias attest to his incredible technique and control, as well as to a powerful emotional expressivity).

Then, in 2002, Lee stepped in on two

OPEN (ART) SEASON

THE SHREVEBURY MUSEUM
PIZZAGALLI CENTER FOR ART AND EDUCATION Finally throws open its tall doors to the public in a grand opening this Sunday August 16. The daylong celebration begins with a gallery talk about an exhibit that has been an awe all summer "Tethered Vertigo" and continues into the evening with live music under a tent on the Civic Lawn.

In between there is the obligatory ribbon-cutting ceremony, more gallery talks, art activities and tours of the entire campus. The star of the show of course, is the stumping new 18,000 square foot Pizzagalli Center itself and for that reason attendees would be advised to listen to the hourlong panel discussion about building the place. A recent similar presentation for mode was a fascinating behind the scenes explanation for anyone interested in architectural, native construction and the technological necessities of modern museums. Accordingly the presenters are museum director THOMAS CHANDLER, director of buildings CHP STRAIN, and representatives from THE CONSTRUCTION Boston-based

Ann Selke Architects and EFFICIENCY REMOVAL

Museum staffers are justifiably excited about the opportunity to provide year-round classes, programming and exhibitions for the first time since the museum opened in 1961. And it seems only right that the Pizzagalli is inaugural exhibit is a piece to founder Cecilia Pizzagalli Webb's "Color Pattern, Whimsy Scale: The Best of the Museum"

Museum" fills the two-floor Theodore H. Church Exhibition Wing with nearly 100 objects — representing more than 100,000 in the permanent collection — and honors her unique vision. Though she grew up surrounded by the trappings of wealth including Impressionist paintings, designer clothing and the finest furnishings, Webb had an insatiable eye for folk and decorative art and was an "early adopter." For this exhibit, museum curators JANA BARRAS and DAVE HARRIS classified a sampling of items along themes of color, pattern, whimsy and scale. Those on display in this luxuriously spacious, high-ceilinged climate-controlled gallery include toys, herbaceous ceramics, furniture, textiles, advertising signs and more.

According to publicity materials, Webb presently stands in 1946. "It is my hope we can have a building of adequate space in site for educational programs and loaned exhibits and also space to be devoted to the interests of Vermonters." This Sunday her wish comes true.

wasn't notice to fill the title role of Don Carlo in Santiago, Chile, and turned the opera world's head. His schedule is now booked through 2018.

Anderson explains how the company managed to lure Lee back to Vermont: "We started planning this years ago and wanted for him to give us a dose." Lee offered August, his only month off between opera seasons. The month is also one of the few extended periods he can spend with his wife and 3-year-old son, so he's making the trip a family vacation.

Having shaped the anniversary concert around Lee, OCM timed, at his suggestion, to its other most successful show—Stephen Weiss, a mezzo-soprano who was still singing as a soprano when she performed opposite Lee as Mizuki in Carmen that first year.

"[I thought], if we can perform together, that will be very unusual," explains Lee.

Weiss attended Masses with Lee, a faculty partner who worked with them both, Ted Taylor, with the accompanist at Saturday's concert. Lee requested to do two duets with Weiss for the recital in honor of their OCM experience, including the first, devastating duet of Carmen.

Weiss has gone on to establish a career in Berlin, singing regularly at Deutsche Oper Berlin and teaching at her private voice studio as well as at the American Institute of Musical Studies in Austria. She recently debuted with the San Diego Opera and will sing three nights in Glenside in Edison's second recital year.

DAVID CLARK, president of the board, says OCM chose two of its more recent singers, "who we think are going to have a major career" to round out the program. Soprano Revis Hill sang in the chorus of The Pearl Fishers in 2010 and stood out so much she sang the part of Lucette in La Bohème the following year. And Branch Paula, a bass, jagged her part in 2012's Thais with a burgeoning career playing Emile de Valques in South Pacific. Fields has also sang Zerkow in Carmen with New York City Opera.

Clark says part of what drives singers to return to Middlebury is the personal interest the board takes in their careers. Some members recently carpooled to Open Strangis to see Hill sing and will even attend her upcoming wedding. Anderson saw Lee in both Met productions, and Clark traveled to see the tenor debut at Covent Garden and the Vienna State Opera in Conradson in 2006. Next year Clark will see Lee sing Andrea Chénier in Zurich.

"I think he appreciates seeing a friendly face," says the former town librarian and adds that he usually meets Lee for dinner before his performances. For successful singers, Clark says, "It's a tough, tough life. You're far from your family, and you don't [always] know the language."

Lee speaks openly of the additional barrier he faced as an Asian singer: an ingrained prejudice in the opera world against casting minorities in leading roles. "The high places, they don't want Asians as principal roles," he says frankly. "Even China, they don't want to have any Asian singers. It's sad but true."

Lee's own foot is finally in the door, but he says, "If I go to a new place [opera house], I have to conquer their thinking."

He's managed to do that everywhere. Every house, including the notoriously tough La Scala in Milan, has wanted him to return.

No conquering will be necessary in Middlebury, where some audience members will likely recall the tenor's original Vermont appearance. If the YouTube clip of Lee singing "Il bacio le stelle" from Donizetti is any indication, that aria alone—which he'll deliver in the second half of the program—will have audiences roaring in their feet. ☐

What's in a Name? Where the One and Only "Brattleboro" Comes From

BY KIRIN J. KELLEY

Vermonters like to think of themselves as unique, but in at least one respect—names of towns—the state sounds a lot like other places. Burlington, for example, has two prominent echoes in North America: one in Iowa, the other in Ontario. Colchester shares its identifier with towns in England and Connecticut. And, while our Charlotte may have a distinctive pronunciation, there are plenty of other Charlottes in the U.S. and the Caribbean.

Brattleboro, however, does appear to be the only town in the world with that name. Calling it unique would still be an exaggeration—and one especially appreciated by residents of Brattleboro Avenue in Des Moines, Iowa.

That thoroughfare runs through a neighborhood developed by a group of businessmen who called themselves the Vermont Syndicate, according to the Des Moines Public Library website. They owned the local streets for Vermont towns, so it still seems reasonable to accept Brattleboro's claim of being one-of-a-kind.

Brattleboro is not the only place in Vermont staking a claim to singularity. "There's only one Lower Junction," proclaims a historical plaque mounted in that village's Amtrak station.

In any event, Brattleboro is named for Col. William Brattle Jr., the first grantee listed on the town charter issued in 1758. Brattleborough, as the name was originally spelled, was officially changed to its Americanized form in 1888.

The Windham County community isn't shy about its special status. The local Chamber of Commerce has fashioned an all-out marketing campaign, complete with neon advertising in Times Square, that boasts of Brattleboro as "The One and Only."

Chamber chief JERRY GOLDBERG says he hatched the idea in 2009 when the town's economy was reeling with a hangover from the Great Recession, which had hampered the tourist the previous year. "We needed to put feet on the street," Goldberg says, recalling downtown's sunken scene. "We needed to show the chamber's members we were at least trying to do something."

The slogan caught on right away, boasts Goldberg, 74, who had a previous career in the marketing department of the CBS television network. "It was an instant get. And now it's becoming institutionalized," he says.

After Years Collecting Dust, Memorial Auditorium's Veteran Plaques Get a Second Life

BY MEGAN JAMES

The plaques of Honor at Auditorium

While researching a new book last year, writer WILL MARCO popped into Burlington's Memorial Auditorium to take a closer look at the plaques that commemorate local veterans of the two World Wars and the Korean War. Flanking through the names, he noticed something odd: The alphabetical listings stopped at M. Where were the rest of the names?

Marco began asking city employees about the missing plaques, and eventually they turned up. Eight of Burlington's 36 memorial plaques had long been tucked out of sight. "They were down under the stairs, covered with dust," Marco says.

How long had they been there? "It's conceivable that they were underground, figuratively speaking, in '58, which is the last time there were any markings on the back of them," says Marco. It's likely they were moved temporarily for some practical reason such as electrical work, and then forgotten about.

Thanks to a successful fundraising campaign—he raised $9900—and a $3000 contribution from the city, Burlington's mayor, WILL LEE, has now fully restored the missing plaques so they can be reinstated this fall.

When Memorial Auditorium was built in 1928, its walls were covered in plaques, says Marco, who was interested in the place as part of this country's "living memorial" movement. After World War I, he explains, people didn't want to commemorate wars with statues, as they had for the Civil War; they wanted to create memorials that served some civic function. "They named highways, they named parks, they named civic buildings," Marco explains. Burlington's Memorial Auditorium is one of dozens of similarly named facilities built around the country in the 1920s.

The plaques are huge and heavy-duty, with torch-shaped borders and, on some, Burlington's city seal, which features a deer head and a fleur-de-lis. Flowery language adorns some. "Dedicated to the glory of almighty God life can compare, Goldberg means, to the thrill of seeing "Brattleboro: The One and Only" (asking last year at starring New Yorkers and growing tensions on the Great White Way. The ad blinked on for five seconds, 120 times a week, on each of two megascreens sponsored by ABC and MTV, respectively. In theory, at least, one million people witnessed it. Goldberg declares to say how much the chamber paid for such colossal exposure.

Brattleboro proclaims itself extraordinary in respect to more than just its name.

The town hosts the Striding of the Beavers every June as Vermont's answer to the Running of the Bulls in Pamplona, Spain. Local boosters also reveal perspective tourism that the Brattleboro area was famous long ago for its hippie communes. The '60s counterculture has had "a lasting influence on the town's character and values," a chamber Mark declares. Brattleboro is likewise proud to have retained a disproportionately large number of bookstores. That faith to the printed page is consistent with the town's impressive literary tradition. A list of 19 famous authors who have lived in or frequented Brattleboro begins with Rudyard Kipling and includes Robert Frost, Sinclair Lewis, Pearl Buck, Grace Paley and James Kennel.

Two additional fun facts help make Brattleboro such a standard place. First, Brattle is home to a strain of rat used in labs all over the world because it's unable to produce a hormone essential to kidney function. And it was there that the U.S. germicide porridge stamp was first produced — in 1947 — and, we assume, sold. ☺ in memory of all the men of Brattleboro who during World War II by their countless sacrifices have advanced the American ideals of liberty and the universal brotherhood of man."

PERHAPS WOULD-BE THIEVES WERE DETERRED BY THEIR BULK;
EACH PLAQUE WEIGHS MORE THAN 200 POUNDS.

Familial area names such as Gable, Bannock and Wheeler populate the plaques, as well as more mysterious ones, such as Shortleaves, that appear multiple times. One plaque commemorates the woman who served, including one who lost her life in World War I.

The heavy bronze plaques would have been "a serious investment back then," says criss crosser, who worked on rehabbing them — burnishing the letters and coating them in epoxy so they'll last longer. "And they have extraordinary scrap value, so it's a wonder they weren't stolen." Perhaps would-be thieves were deterred by their bulk; each plaque weighs more than 200 pounds, Connors says.

The project has Maine thinking about more recent wars and how we commemorate them. "And he also if there were subsequent memorials to Vietnam, Afghanistan," he says. "The chamber has been so conflicted about overseas wars I think one of the great ironies is that we build a great big memorial to 9/11, which is not at the end of the war but at the beginning of the war. That's emblematic of the nature of this war."

Maine is aiming for a celebratory reinstallation of the plaques in Memorial Auditorium at the 11th house on November 11, Armistice Day. ☺

WHISKEY TANGO FOXTROT

We just had to ask...

What's the story behind the stenciled Gs around Middlebury?

BY MEREDITH WHITE

From the middle of the sound about in downtown Middlebury, three letter Gs are visible—one on the back of a road sign, one on a telephone pole.

Those aren't your typical graffiti tags. The stenciled Gs are consistent, varying only in size and some minimal drapage. They're black, and elegant and, if you start paying attention, you'll find them everywhere—in steel street signs, electrical boxes, telephone poles and the sides of buildings throughout Addison County and beyond.

Seven Days spent a recent afternoon loitering outside Two Brothers Tavern, chatting up passersby in an effort to uncover the mystery of the G. Who is responsible? What's the motto? And well, yes, what's it stand for?

Everyone had a theory—or at least one up. Folks who said they were seeing the Gs for the first time took shots in the dark at the tag's significance. In this college town, those conjectures ranged academic: Does it have something to do with the "G geography" from Richard III? Is it a nod to Guinness of Carronagh (Carronaghans are said to have a disproportionate preference for the drink)? Is it an allusion to God houses?

Other passersby weren't so sure. "Doesn't look like a G," said a white-haired man visiting from New York City. "I see an H and a Y in script," his wife offered. The New Yorker misheard "BAND"—short for "bass old star"—a tag that cropped up around the Big Apple in the late '70s attributed to artist Jean-Michel Basquiat. "Maybe this guy's trying to be like him," he said.

"It doesn't look like graffiti, looks too neat to be graffiti," countered James Berg, his son Noah in tow. Or perhaps G stands for graffiti, a faster talker named Stanford hypothesized. "It's self-referential," he said.

G is for Garand, "which is an all very beautiful weapons, which I use in all my novels," said an author sitting on a bench.

"It's a gang symbol, but a Middlebury gang symbol, which means it's very linen, polite; it's quite stylish," offered Karl Lindholm, who teaches American studies at Middlebury College.

"That stands for Gen Y," a bike-balanced geology professor, Peter Ryan, confidently theorized. "It's a very understated generation," he said of the cohort born between the 1980s and the early 2000s, "and one that needs a little more cred."

A man wearing a gold chain stopped to give the G on the back of a yield sign a closer look. "Goesa Mountain State?" He pointed. "No, that'd be too easy; maybe it's gotta be something a bit more complicated."

Then he offered a key piece of advice about small-town sleuthing: "If I don't know, I ask one of two people, the bartender and the barber. They know everything."

And thus, by the jigaw magic that Vermont conservatives often facilitate, hints and tips led us straight to our G man. But in the interest of confidentiality and the street artist's future career, let's call this Gen Y'er—whose Seven Days eventually reached by phone—Gary.

"My goal is to be the most famous graffiti writer in Vermont, which is akin to being, like, the best skier in Egypt," gripped Gary, a graphic designer by trade. "I aspire to live cheaply and somehow have enough money to live a meager existence and work as little as possible."

It was more than a year ago that Gary used his computer to enlarge the script G graphic—which he had created for a previous art project—in to various sizes. Then he began stenciling them onto surfaces in the town.

"They were like a message to one particular person," he said, admitting that he was surprised anyone had even noticed the Gs. "People tend to ignore things that they're not interested in."

Gary refers to the yearlong job as stenciling Gs as his "campaign." "Real graffiti, the genre I was playing when I was in New York, it's about being famous and getting your name out there," he said.

But this campaign was different. It started when Gary's girlfriend left him, he said, "for some guy with a motorcycle, a job and quantum bubble morality."

"It was about love, it started about love," he said. "But you know, once you put it out there enough, you know, that's your identity, you become that, it becomes you, or whatever."

He added, "I can't say, I can't write, you know, so this is what I do."

During his campaign, Gary did his stenciling quietly at night, and said he authorities only interfered once. "There was a time when I was, like, you know, fuck it, I've gotten get caught and that's just part of the whole thing. I'm willing to be arrested for love."

G, it turns out, is for Gretchen. "Yeah, so it didn't work out," said Gary, who says he enjoys the small of spray paint. "She's moved on and so have I. You know, the alphabet is filled with letters, so I've moved on to painting Hs." ☺

Pubic Pride

The vagina has had a hard year. But things are looking up. A year after Michigan Democratic State Rep. Lisa Brown was ridiculed for uttering the word on the House floor—debating against that state's massive anti-abortion bill—three more states have passed, or moved toward passing, laws mandating unnecessary vaginal examinations.

As of August 1, according to the Guttmacher Institute, 22 states require that women seeking abortions either submit to a transvaginal ultrasound (involving the insertion of a wand-like sensor) and be shown the images from it or given the "option" to view them. All, of course, to help women make "informed decisions."

Last month, with Gov. Scott Walker's signature, Wisconsin joined four other states with the severest standards. They command every potential abortion patient to undergo the probe. Reproductive rights advocates call it "medical rape."

Not everyone is taking these developments lying down with legs open. The laws are under legal challenge. And when Wisconsin joined the disbeliever roll, comedian Sarah Silverman got right to the point: The governor wouldn't dare trust a man's office with such inquisitiveness.

"I'd very much like to really probe GovernorWalker such that he needs to make an informed decision," Silverman tweeted ingeniously.

Joe Salazar, the Hahmarmouth Colorado Democratic legislator, apparently extracted the comment, which moved the state's Republican committee to draft off a press release accusing Salazar of calling for Walker's rape. And that, the GOP sniped, was "demeaning and offensive to victims everywhere."

You may recall Salazar is pressing the view that female students shouldn't be allowed to carry concealed handguns on campus (yes, this is legal in Colorado) because they might mistake an innocent gay bar rapper and "pop-a-round at him."

Setting aside the dubious wisdom of arming the students of Colorado—home of Columbine, Four Canyon and Aurora—it becomes apparent that where women and their vaginas are concerned, male politicians have a lot to say.

And what they're saying, on the whole, is that women can't be trusted to take care of their own.

At the time, some said she'd say "That Campbell got laid."

But vaginal intrusions are not just for politicians anymore. In Texas—which, incidentally, just passed one of the most restrictive abortion laws since Roe v. Wade—cops have been taking the provocative liberty into their own hands.

Last week, the pro-gun advocates of state troopers conducting "vaginal and anal searches on women stopped for speeding or, in one case, shopping cigarette buds not her car window. The Texas Department of Public Safety, which oversees the state police, denies this isn't official policy, and indeed you won't find it in the training manuals. But lawyers and civil rights advocates representing the women wonder how easily identical searches—you can hardly call them "procedures"—could have happened at traffic stops hundreds of miles apart.

Women are suing police for state-filing expeditions in Florida and Milwaukee, Wis.

That's the bad news.

Now the good news: The vagina is enjoying a little public relations blitz.

I'm not talking about the mailing of the 17-year-old Vagina Monologues by playwright Eve Ensler and several female legislators on the Michigan Statehouse steps after Lisa Brown's creation.

I mean two brand-new witty bits of Public Pride propaganda.

The first is the production of a color poster and postercard that "celebrates female genital diversity" with illustrations (from photos) of 16 unique vulvas, accompanied by women's edifying disquisitions of advice.

Launched by Kinsey Institute area researcher and educator Debby Herbenick and her University of Indiana colleague Vanessa Schick, the project started with a survey (investigating women's feelings about their vulvas and vaginas asked what they like about their genitalia, the respondents went ecstatic. They're "fun," "intriguing" and "cozy and comfortable," women said. One called hers "absolutely beautiful."

Research shows that women who "feel positively about their vulvas and vaginas" have better sex and less sexual anxiety and take better care of their gyneological health, says Herbenick. So the profanities want to spread the love.

The posters are "perfect" for hanging in dorms and clinics, Herbenick notes in a Kickstarter video. Or you can send a postcard to "your favorite politician" who could stand to learn a thing or two about women's bodies.

The pitch quickly attracted its goal of $4000 and closed donations last week. But watch the video anyway. It's a consciousness-raising simply to peruse the collection of urine, gush and crocheted vulva puppets and hear the lovely, bright-eyed Herbenick say "vulvas and vaginas" over and over.

The other, much bigger phenomenon is "The Camp Gyno," a promotional video from HelloFlo, a company that makes consumer-friendly menstrual supply packages timed to their cycles. The ad, which has been viewed more than 5 million times on YouTube, is hilarious—positively enlightening. The best part: Its sexual allude.

In the spot, a camper played by 30-year-old Miley McGrath tells how she goes from being a "big random loss" to the "first girl at camp to get her period"—"the red badge of woman"—and assumes the mantle of Camp Gyno, dispensing advice and enforcing military-like discipline on other menstruating campers.

"I was their Joan of Arc," she says. "It's like, I'm Joan, and their vag is the ark."

Then girls start getting "Braggie" sex packages" containing tampons, party favors and candy. The Camp Gyno is deposited.

Will repeat sign up for HelloFlo? You almost hope the ad campaign will tell the service it's advertising.

After all, more than consciousness, it's shame about the vagina and its design that would motivate someone to receive her tampons in a plain brown wrapper.

And the Camp Gyno will be more of that. ☺

THE VAGINA IS ENJOYING A LITTLE PUBLIC RELATIONS BLITZ.

FRESH CUT

Vermont's meat industry gets a boost from Black River's new processing plant

BY CORIN HITCH

The employees of cutters at Black River Meats.

The 25 Berkshire-Cheshire pigs that recently arrived at 45 Parkhurst Road in North Springfield had lived a charmed life, at least for pigs: eating grain that had been hand-picked by their owner and avoiding contamination around 200 hilly acres near Woodbury Hills. And, after they met a quick end at a local slaughterhouse, the pigs became processors, of a sort.

Out longhorns, they were packed into carcass-size plastic bags and trucked to Black River Produce. This spring, the North Springfield-based fresh-food distributor took on a new role: meat processor. It was there, at Black River's still-under-construction processing facility, that the pig sides were unloaded and rolled through the monthly empty backlog to the hanging room at its center. There, six men in white coats and rubber boots hung the sides on hooks and, one by one, got to work on them with saws and knives. In just today and a half, the 25 pigs were transformed into piles of ham, loins, chops, roasts and heads.

Just as quickly, those parts disappeared in something of a pork diaspora: bellies and ham were sent to Vermont Smoke and Cure, other bellies to the chef of Craigie On Mils in Cambridge, Mass. Legs went to Rhode Island's Dinnale to be made into prosciutto. Various cuts were trucked to chefs around Vermont ("One chef buys all of the hocks," says production manager Dominic Iltisano). Tenderloins and other chops were sealed, marked with a Black River Meat label and shelved in the company's enormous cooler, destined to be sold at retail stores around Vermont and New Hampshire.

Though Black River Produce's new plant—which also processes beefed—is barely three months old, its custom work with intensity and speed, making this place a potential game changer for the local meat industry. Vermont has long struggled with a bottleneck at the slaughter and processing levels, a frustrating challenge for farmers who might otherwise grow their hogs to meet the rising demand for local meat.

"It takes longer to process an animal than it takes to slaughter," says Chelsea Binkerd Lewis, the state's senior agricultural development coordinator. In grad school, she wrote a thesis examining whether slaughterhouses utilizing the meat sector's growth—and concluded that the real problem was with processing.

For Binkerd Lewis, who also heads the Meat Processing Task Force of the state's Farm to 2016 initiative, processing has been a key problem to solve. "The meat industry comes up as one of Agriculture Secretary Chiles' top three in terms of where he sees the future of the Vermont ag sector going," she says. "We've been pouring a lot of investment into both the regulatory and development sides, to expand capacity for slaughter and processing."

Once upon a time, Vermont had more than 20 slaughterhouses, Binkerd Lewis points out. In the 1980s, those slaughterhouses began to lose business to the growing meat-industrial complex out west, and they couldn't keep up with some regulatory changes that required a new level of record keeping," she says, referring to the detailed safety protocol of that meat and poultry processors must follow to operate.

IF WE HAVE ONE GOAL WITH THIS PLANT, IT IS TO BE ABLE TO GET VERMONT MEAT INTO BIGGER MARKETS.

SEAN RICHANAN

Now there are only five functioning slaughterhouses in the state, and this limitation on farmers was a key driver in Black River's decision to purchase this 40,000-square-foot building from Springfield.

Just about the only clues to the former life of the 50-year-old behemoth are a few walk-in refrigerators, Ben & Jerry's made in Peace Pops here in the 1980s and '90s. After the company moved out in 2002, the place housed Ellsworth Ice Cream, which in turn moved out in 2007. So, visible inside off with some of the building's wiring and pipes, two years ago, a quarter of the structure collapsed under the weight of snow on the roof.

Even in horrible shape, the place caught the eye of Black River Produce founders Mack Curran and Steve Rizzo, who have a proven knack for noticing gaps in the local food system. Rather than run, they saw potential.

SPECIAL DELIVERY

Curran and Rizzo were self-proclaimed ski bums when they met in the late 1970s. Rizzo hit back a ride to Glenora in Curran's van, and they soon began chatting about business ideas. Rizzo, who worked in a restaurant, knew how hard it was for Vermont chefs to get their hands on fresh produce. So they painted the side of a van with the phrase "Give Pigs a Chance!" and began picking up produce from markets in Boston to drive back to Vermont, stopping at restaurants along the way.

Thirty-plus years later, Black River has 2000 wholesale accounts throughout New England, including schools, food markets, farm stands and its own bread-and-butter customers, restaurants. That single van has been replaced with a fleet of trucks, all adorned with the company's signature stone-harry logo. They deliver produce, cheese, flowers, fish and meat to chefs and restaurants, often within 24 hours of their orders being placed. Black River's 60,000-square-foot North Springfield warehouse employs 155 people, last year the company's meat sales totaled $15 million, and they are expected to grow by 25 percent this year.

Black River didn't start much meat at all until five years ago, when the company hired Tom Rizzo, of a cooperative called Vermont Quality Meats, to grow that sector. When Black River began selling grass-fed beef, Curran says, it wholesaled for $4.29 per pound—a price that caused some customers to balk. "They said, 'We're paying $1.69 a pound. Kind of weird,'" he recalls.

Still, the company persisted in selling local beef, chicken and pork, mostly to restaurants, specialty food stores and a few institutional clients, including Fletcher Allen Health Care. About two years ago, demand for local meat began to surge—but, like farmers, Black River was beholden to the processing fees charged by slaughterhouses, which could tack on upward of $1 per every pound of meat. And, because processing technologies varied from place to place, the cost consistency prized by chefs was sometimes hard to achieve, Curran says.

As the company's leaders considered how they might bring processing in-house, Curran and others traveled to meat-processing facilities in Minnesota, North Carolina and Italy, where "I was impressed by the larger scale of those operations," Curran says. Black River, they concluded, placed to add a 5000-square-foot processing area to their existing warehouse. But, on the brink of breaking ground, Curran and co. were hit by a revelation.

"We'd need a lot more than 5000 square feet. And, two miles away, there's this big Ben & Jerry's plant," Curran remembers realizing. "It was in unbelievably rough shape, but its bones were good. We knew it would be a major investment."

"I think at first, the scale seemed a little more per pig." Finch notes "That has kept the price [of meat] very high. I will always keep my pork affordable."

POINT OF SALE

Price is always on the minds of retailers such as Alex Barone, the deli manager at Patney Food Co-op and distributor of both the cheese and meat cases. "The meat case used to be this two-tier cooler at the back of the store," she notes. "We've done a lot of different things with our meat department, trying to make it a successful small department. We did some marbled meat pork and beef (for a while, and, though it's the cheaper price, people say they want the quality [of local meat])."

"They just don't necessarily want the price that comes with it. And therein lies a fundamental challenge to the concept of raising and selling local meat. 'People want it, but it's a little shock,'" says Barone. "I understand where the price is coming from, but a big part for consumers is not understanding that. People think that we put up the price. A huge chunk of any job and effort is to get local food in people's mouths, and I spend so much time trying to get the cheapest price for these products. I'm at the lowest retail price that I can go."

Barone buys beef and pork from Black River, as well as beef from North Hollow Farm in Rochester, pork from Harlow Farm in Westmoreland, and chickens from Mary Knoll Farms, Coleman Natural and Bell & Evans. As she compares the deals she has landed on each batch, it's clear they involve a complex equation in which the variables are what she can afford to pay, what the consumers will pay, and which meat will move before it spoils on the shelf. "It's like playing X-Men with a highly perishable and expensive product," Barone says.

For instance, poultry processing is so expensive in Vermont, "It can be cheaper to eat local beef than local chicken," she says. That's why Barone's store features several choices.

Though Black River meat tends to be "priced," Barone says, "they're trying to provide a safe, clean place for people to bring their animals. I was excited to hear about it both professionally and personally."

Barone will soon be raising her own cows for beef on land she purchased in Springfield.

Like her, Sean Buchanan describes a tension between what consumers say they want to buy and what they're willing to buy. "People say, 'I only want 100 percent grass-fed.' But sometimes there's an imbalance between what people are vocalizing and what they really want."

For now, the tax pays who work at Black River's meat-processing plant are not only cutting the meat but grinding and packing it, too. "Yesterday we had to pack 100 pounds of sausage into 10-pound pounds," Barone says. "That was a long day."

After those pigs were out the door, the concern anticipated a few more long days processing 30 lambs. That kind of traffic explains why Black River is on the lookout for "qualified citizens," says Barone. "The more we have, the more meat we can take on."

That's music to the ears of people like Barone, who hopes that a consistent supply of locally raised, reasonably priced meat might coax people away from supermarket coolers and into independent retailers — and, in turn, support the growth of local farms. "If consumers buy local meat from their local small store, they're ultimately supporting a bigger cause," she says. ☐

Pooch Pics

With Judd Lamphere, aging dogs get their day in the studio

BY ROBIN PARKER

They say you can't teach an old dog new tricks. But don't tell that to Judd Lamphere. Or to the pups that pose for him. The Burlington photographer's apocryphal, brick-walled Rectiguency Radio on College Street has lately been hosting painting classes that were eager to show in front of his camera. Up two flights of snuggly stairs, Lamphere is working on a project to document the faithful love of aging furry friends. "You is a way to honor that," he says.

"This" is his Old Dogs series—close-up portraits of beloved pets in their graying last years, shot against an inkly black background. The pictures are sometimes whimsical, all too poignant.

Lamphere, 32, has eight of these pictures so far on his website, along with the more commercial and human portraits on which he spends most of his time. While the Old Dogs project is new to Lamphere's career, he mostly works an editorial photography for a variety of organizations, including a recent gig for Guinness documenting the July 20th centennial in Canada.

Lamphere says that Roscoe, a friendly "crazy-y-cared dog" he had known all her life, initially inspired him. As she aged, white hair appeared on Roscoe's jet-black fur, giving her what Lamphere thought was a regal look. He took a few shots and created his first print of an old dog.

Encouraged by this portrait, Lamphere then shot Mr. R, a pug belonging to his studio mate, Miss Day in the picture. Mr. P's pink tongue lolls out the side of his mouth, which seems to be grinning. And so the Old Dogs project was born.

Lamphere, who grew up in Underhill, says he had many dogs in his youth, and witnessed the "grace and strength" as they aged. Although he hasn't owned a dog since just before college, he gets plenty of time to play with friends' dogs — and to watch them grow old.

The project, so far, has relied mostly on word of mouth, and Lamphere has been providing two digital prints to each owner who participates.

The primary focus of the project is to create a strictly portrait of every dog, one that represents their character, personality, love and grace," Lamphere says.

Ultimately, he'd like to accumulate enough portraits to create and publish a coffee-table book and donate most of the proceeds from sales to local shelters. Lamphere notes that people usually adopt puppies, children tend to have lots of old dogs. His dream, he says, would be to see retired meat buns for old dogs.

In the meantime, Lamphere is shooting dogs in his studio as people seek him out — a couple of times a month at this point.

His images capture each dog's unique character, which "could be anything, and I won't discover it until I start working with him or her," he says. In some cases there is something unusual about the animals, too, as in the case of her, or a fugged-up eye. Sometimes it's a distinctive personality or behavior. Such was the case with Dingo, an 11-year-old Staffordshire terrier. "Whenever she hears a baritone, she puffs her cheeks out like she's trying to sing," Lamphere says.

He places the dogs against a plain black background because he wants them "to stand out and really show their age and the contrast with the white hairs growing on," Lamphere explains. And he doesn't make the dogs sit. In most portraits, their heads lean close to the camera or look straight up, as some there is just a tail or a wriggle going around. Lamphere's digital portraits are unapologetically detailed, right down to the salivary on the dogs' tongues. The images seem so real, in fact, a viewer is tempted to reach out and pet them.

Lamphere says he tries to make a connection with each dog, shooting it at eye level, often perched on the floor. These pictures suggest he's taken his job too far. In photos of Melly, a 13-year-old golden retriever, she appears to snarl. This grows widely. Her sparkling eyes reveal that she's enjoying the attention.

This is apparent even with dogs you'd assume might be fearful or skittish. Miller, a 10-year-old Beagle mix, was 7 when someone took behind his house exploded and burned down a shed. As a result, Lamphere says, the dog has a phobia of lights and fire — not ideal for a photographer snapping pictures with a flash. But Lamphere managed to photograph Miller and even convey his shy personality, in one of his portraits, the animal is partially turned away and looking back over his shoulder.

So far, Lamphere has photographed 12 dogs, three of them died shortly after their studio session, leaving behind these images as testaments to their lives. (This writer's dog, Big, was one of them.) The oldest dog he has shot was 16, the youngest, 12. Lifespan, after all, "depends on the breed, because all dogs age differently," Lamphere says.

Each portrait is truly different, because, quite simply, each dog is unique. "It really depends on their mood, character and energy level," Lamphere says of his subjects. "Some dogs are very calm and good bouncers, so I tend to take more shots with them and experiment with different angles and lenses. Others can be very timid, so I try to just get one steady portrait and detail of their."

Lamphere has shot the majority of his portraits at his photography, but as these images stain, he's too difficult for some dogs to climb, he's also made a few house calls. And, Lamphere says, he wants to schedule a shoot — possibly at a shelter — where people can bring their dogs to be photographed in an off-site studio.

"The more people I can schedule, the better," he says, referring to his backlog. Lamphere is likely to get there, after all, every puppy will someday be an old dog, too.

Plane Sight

Hobbyists, lawmakers and privacy advocates keep their eyes on drone development

BY TAYLOR DOBBS

TECHNOLOGY

I'm flying straight toward a hillside at 75 miles per hour. As I squint at the overgrown shrubbery in front of me, I can make out myself standing alongside Jim Carroll and Mark Rochefort. I go flying over my head and up the left line at Roban Valley Ski Area, and then zip back down along the trail. After another pass, the ground rushes up, and everything goes black.

The eerie feeling of flying or hovering above oneself is usually the sharpest stuff of dreams, but a few Vermonters get their thrills doing just that—with drones.

These "drones" are really just high-tech remote-control (RC) planes. The y're launched by hand and controlled with what looks like an industrial-strength video-game controller. The cool part: Instead of squinting into the sun and trying to figure out where their plane is, members of this small but growing FPV (first-person view) community wear video goggles linked to a camera mounted on the front of the plane, so they see what the drone sees. Hundreds of feet in the air and sometimes miles away from where the pilot is standing.

Carroll and Rochefort are able to send their Racing Zephyr II models over vast swaths of the Green Mountain State, recording high-definition videos of racetracks as well as Carroll's home and Lake Champlain. Afterward, they cut the FPV videos to music and post them online, joining an international community of thousands of hobbyists who are doing the same.

To hear them talk about it, though, you wouldn't think Carroll and Rochefort were standing on a hillside on a rainy day. The bugs they share's more like that of a college engineering class: gears, ratios, quads, multicopters, pepper boxes, immersion transmitters and spectrum analyzers. But these two aren't electrical engineers or professional hardware manufacturers. Rochefort, 60, is the owner of Vermont Tire & Service, Carroll, 44, is a software developer. Their only qualifications are having some spare time and money, tolerant wives, and an almost monk-like acceptance of disappointment.

"Being into RC is learning to live with loss," Rochefort says. That's because, for all their high-tech gadgetry, these planes are still just long pieces of lightweight foam or stretched metal. A strong gust of wind, radio interference or pilot error can lead to a crash, and that can be costly.

On each of their planes' frame wings, Carroll and Rochefort have wired an array of cameras—one to broadcast back to their goggles and a GoPro, the HD camera mounted on the front of the plane to get unobstructed video—at least two antennae, an electric propeller and some belly buttons that help the planes reach speeds approaching 100 miles an hour. The technology that enables the small plane to fly runs

Photo: Kelley

$1000 to $1500, depending on which optional components are installed. Rochefort puts a GPS autopilot system on his Zephyr so it will fly itself back to him if he loses control. On the ground, tripod-mounted systems that communicate with the plane add up to about $1000 more.

With five-figure price tags, these personal setups aren't for penny-pinchers. Carroll and Rochefort say they don't know if anyone else in Vermont who has a similar model, though there are a few more FPVs in the state using similar planes. These drones are a far cry from their brethren flying over America's war zones. Still, privacy concerns have at least one Vermont politician working to regulate their commercial use.

Congressman Peter Welch announced a plan last month to introduce legislation that would require businesses using drones over U.S. soil to report to the Federal Aviation Administration exactly what data they'd be collecting, how they would use the information, who they would share it with and how long they'd keep it. Welch's proposal moved Carroll to write to the Vermont representative.

It's got some important privacy concerns," Carroll writes in an e-mail to Welch. But the hobbyist worries that potential new legislation could make FPV flights more difficult or prohibit them altogether. "The most important thing to me is that we make it clear on the law that it only applies to aircraft that are capable of surveillance," Carroll says.

Hobbyist rigs such as his and Rochefort's are not sufficient to easily, slowly or stealthily take another's photo or to find an individual in a crowd, so Carroll doesn't see privacy concerns as genuine to what he is doing.

Allen Gilbert, the executive director of the Vermont ACLU, joined Welch as promoting the new legislation. He says Vermontans will be seeing more drones in coming years with increasingly powerful surveillance capabilities.

"Almost by definition, police use of drones pose a greater risk to your liberty (than use by a private company) because of how the information could be used to operate you, correctly or incorrectly in criminal activities," he says. But that doesn't mean private users are harmless. The proliferation of hobbyist drones could lead to embarrassing and potentially harmful violations of privacy, too.

EVEN 30 FEET ABOVE YOU, YOU CAN FEEL THE WIND FROM IT, LET ALONE THE MASSIVE AMOUNT OF NOISE THAT IT MAKES.

"What's identical in each case is the incredible surveillance capabilities these small, increasingly cheap devices have," Gilbert notes.

Roche has, who also has a quadcopter—a four-rotor, hovering drone that can stay in one place and observe a small area—doesn't see spying as viable. "It's friction,"

Roche says. "For it to be far enough away where it can just stay up there and watch you, it has to be pretty damn far. Even 30 feet above you, you can feel the wind from it, let alone the massive amount of noise that it makes."

While a civilian, unlicensed spy drone is still mostly unsuitable for the average homeowner, the technology is constantly improving, and part of Welch's proposed legislation is to help regulators keep up.

Welch spokesman Ryan Nichols says in an email that hobbyists are "implicitly exempted from the legislation," so they can keep on flying. Commercial users, however, such as WGAX—which owns a quadcopter but hasn't used it for news reporting yet—would have to provide a "data collection statement" to the FAA under Welch's legislation.

"Rep. Welch believes this is not an unreasonable requirement of drone users and is a necessary safeguard to have in place considering the powerful potential this technology has to infringe upon individual privacy," Nichols adds.

For higher-flying uses, such as search and rescue, wildfire monitoring, natural-disaster reconnaissance, and even surveillance, the FAA wants to integrate drones into the National Airspace System, which is in place to make sure all aircraft over the U.S. operate safely and don't crash into each other. Congress mandated last year that the FAA must integrate drones by late 2015, but according to its own recent report, the agency is months behind schedule.

At the state level, Vermont lawmakers this year introduced legislation that could restrict drone use by law enforcement agencies—for example, limiting the device's facial-recognition use and implementing strict reporting requirements. That bill is expected to move forward next spring, but it is just a precautionary measure for now, as Vermont police forces are using drones yet.

Back in Baltimore—where Carroll and Rochelet are flying with permission from the state—I ask Carroll if the 30-feet limit has reached into a mall.

"Yes," he says.

"Is that going to be OK?"

"Probably not."

Carroll swears as if he's just lost a golf ball on the rough and now has $1200 in play. As Rochelet jogs up the hill toward the crash site, Carroll can't fully reason his goggles and push his controller away.

"So this is another air-militer risk," he says as we walk up the slope to discover it's just a metal $200 GoPro on the structure of the wing itself. This isn't much, but Carroll seems to have found a detached joy in it, like being on a merry-go-round.

We and Rochelet look the place over for cracks or an obvious piece, but don't notice any. Carroll seems genuinely surprised, and his typical laid-back demeanor turns to cockiness.

"Look at that!" he exclaims. "Totally unworried!"

Why Vermont families open their doors to Lake Monsters

BY DAN BILLET

In 1995, Freda Tutt was sitting on the stands at Centennial Field, taking in a Vermont Expos baseball game with her son, when a message crackled across the public address system.

"They made an announcement at the end of a game that they were looking for host families for the last few weeks of the season," Tutt recalls in a recent phone conversation. "My son, who was 10 at the time, decided that we had to have a player live with us."

Through the team's host-family program, they ended up landing Puerto Rican pitcher Juan Rosado into their Essex Junction home for the remainder of that season. Tutt says her son, Jon Prosserelli, and Rosado hit it off immediately.

"They went everywhere together," she says. "They connected right away."

That's a good thing, considering the two shared a bunk bed in Prosserelli's room.

"Sam slept on the top bunk and Juan slept on the bottom bunk," says Tutt.

"It was like having a big brother," says Prosserelli from his home in North Carolina.

Prosserelli, who is now an active duty in the Navy, recalls playing catch with Rosado in the field at Centennial. After games, the pitcher would often bring him into the team clubhouse—now called the professional baseball academy—where other non-players. Their relationship grew so close that the Tutt family later visited Rosado and his relatives in Puerto Rico.

For the 19 seasons since, Tutt and her husband, Mike, have continued to host players from Major League Baseball teams—that called the Vermont Expos, now the Vermont Lake Monsters. Though the players are technically pros, they don't get paid much, and they hail from as far away as Central America and the Caribbean. They need local housing for the summer.

Host families get free tickets to games and a stipend to cover kids' costs, among other modest benefits. The players get food, clothes and, on occasion, a lift to the ballpark. But in the Tutt's experience shows, hosting players is about more than just giving them a place to crash.

Brian Price and his family have housed eight Lake Monsters players in their Burlington home over the past six years. "It really isn't to have someone added to interruption into your life and your kids' lives, too."

Like the Tutts, the Prices became a host family because they thought it would be a good experience for their kids. They hoped having a pro player around the house would give their sons—Eli, 12, and Austin, 10—a better understanding of the sacrifice and dedication it takes to play baseball at a high level.

"They both love the game," says Price. "Like any kids, they dream about what it would be like if you stay with it and get good and play professionally."

This year, the Prices are hosting Herschel "Boog" Powell, an outfielder from Mission Viejo, Calif. The 20-year-old spent a year in junior college in California before going pro but had otherwise never been away from home, let alone across the country to Vermont.

"Burlington is pretty different from home," Powell says from the living room of the Price's house in the Old North End. "But it's an awesome place."

Powell says he and Eli have become fast friends, bonding over a shared love of video games and, of course, baseball—Eli plays in a Lake Ruth League in Burlington.

"I'm rarely in my room unless I'm going to bed," Powell says of his spare but comfortable second-floor bedroom. "I'm usually down here hanging out with Eli and Austin."

Austin plays American Legion baseball, a competitive level after high school

Powell says he gives the older Price boy baseball pointers on occasion, but since they're closer in age, their conversations mostly revolve around bigger topics.

"We talk more about life in general," says Powell. "Since he'll be going to college, we talk about college a lot, what to do, what not to do."

By nature, the lifestyle of a minor-league baseball player is one of uncertainty; most will never make it to the majors. At any moment, a player could learn that he has been demoted, cut or traded—there are 150 players on the list of "players to be named later" on any given Vermont roster. That's pressure enough for anyone, especially ball players who are practically still kids themselves. Many of them, like Powell, are away from their families for the first time, so having a place to call home is critical.

"The Prices have made it so I don't get homesick," says Powell. "They act like they're my family."

According to Lake Monsters representative Kate Elio, the team's housing model is emulated by most lower-level minor-league franchises, from rookie ball to high-A ball.

"It is a pretty standard practice across the board," she says in a recent phone call.

Elio has been the Lake Monsters' merchandise and accounting manager for four years, and she oversees the host-family program. With Freda Tutt's help, Elio coordinates the placement of the team's 30 players—this year into 38 households. She generally assigns each franchise to take in more than one player at a time.

"It gives the other guy a buddy," she says, "someone to hang out with if it's their last weekend."

More than two, however, can get a bit out of hand.

The Tutts typically host two players a year, but last summer they put up five at once—right tumbled over the course of the season—squeezed into their bedrooms in their rented ranch.

"That was a little crazy," Tutt admits. "Those guys can eat a lot of food."

Host families are free to set their own rules for players, ranging from hosting guests and curfews to whether or not athletes can consume alcohol in the house. The only requirement for families is that they provide a room with a door—and, of course, a bed.

The players "need a space they can go to and get away, get a good night's sleep and be at their best to perform," says Licho.

Licho notes that the Lake Monsters don't do background checks on either the players or the families, noting the team has never had a problem with safety. She explains that a variety of factors determine where the players live, including which ones have cars and, in the case of foreign players, fluency in English.

"You get a mixed bag of guys who can speak English really well, some who can speak it a little and some who can't at all," says Licho. "We try to reach out to as many people as we can in the community that speak Spanish, which is a little difficult in this area."

Pine says his family has hosted Spanish-speaking players in the past, but they asked for an English-speaking player this season.

"My wife speaks some Spanish," he says. "But [the language barrier] was always a challenge, because you want the players to feel comfortable. And you want something a little bit more for you and your family, too. It's not just about getting a free ticket [to the games]."

While Tremblay sees other intangible benefits from hosting Lake Monsters players, he and his family have been participating in the hosting program for four years. He says that having professional players in his house (Tremblay lives with his kids 14-year-old Jake, and Emma, 11).

"Baseball is given a gift," he says, referring to the players' baseball skills. "But you still have to work hard at that gift which is good for my kids to see."

This year, the Tremblays are hosting Chas Wolfe, a 23-year-old shortstop from Houston, Texas, Tremblay says. Wolfe goes out of his way to spend time with the children.

"He comes home and plays catch with my son," he says. "That's pretty special. How many kids can say they play catch with a professional baseball player?"

He adds that his daughter, whom he describes as "terrified of any sport with a ball," has taken an interest in baseball since Wolfe arrived.

"It makes it special for her to go to a game and have someone to root for," he says.

The Tatts, Pines and Tremblays stay in touch with most of the players they've hosted and keep track of their progress.

"I've been to weddings, I got birth announcements," says Paula Tatt, who refers to her players as "base sons." She adds that one of them calls her every Mother's Day.

Of the three families, only the Tatts have had a player reach the major leagues: all-star outfielder Jason Bay, who played with the Vermont Expos in 2000. Bay is now with the Seattle Mariners after playing with the Boston Red Sox from 2004 to '09 and the New York Mets from 2010 to '12. The Tatts also hosted a Lake Monsters coach, Rick Robinson, who went on to become a hitting coach with the Washington Nationals.

Tatt takes pride in being "just one step along the way" for his players — and the occasional coach — and will often tweet about their progress, in baseball and other things.

"I follow their baseball careers," she says. "And when they're no longer in baseball, I follow their new careers."

Tatt points out that, when she first signed up to host players, she did it for her son. "I thought it would be a great way to give him a strong role model," she says.

"As the years went on, and my son grew up, it became more about giving these guys an opportunity not to have to worry about anything other than playing baseball, to give them a safe place to come home and eat dinner," she continues. "I always thought that if my son was away from home like they are, I would want someone watching out for my kid, too." ☺

Theater review: The Winter's Tale by Vermont Shakespeare Company

BY ALEX BROWN

Surging Shakespeare audiences in a direct invitation to enjoy a playwright whose works are in rebirth as a sunset for bringing us joy. Packed with possibilities, the plays always need rediscovering by theatergoers, and local Shakespeareans are fortunate to have the greatest talents of the Vermont Shakespeare Company working in Burlington and North Hero.

Director John Nagle and eight skilled actors find new treasures in The Winter's Tale, and invite us to ponder of wonder fairy tale, anti-fairy comedy and pastoral romance delightfully subverted. It's not an easy trick, for Shakespeare's plot makes enough sharp turns to derail the less experienced.

Leontes, King of Sicilia, has a charming young son and is awaiting the birth of his second child with his loving wife, Hermione. His boyfriend friend, Polixenes, is visiting, and all is serene—until Leontes' fancies are kindled. Unfounded jealousy consumes the king, and his irrational rejection of wife, son and newborn daughter grieves his heart. Leontes will realize, too late, the error of his ways, and the play ends in redemption. It takes some young lovers and comic rascals to achieve it, and a host of magic to reach the happy ending.

Michael Dean McDermott brings superb acting skills to the role of Leontes, and demonstrates it best when he portrays the character's oddball, insane jealousy. As an actor inventing the portrayal of personality, Shakespeare's expert twisting the result of an emotional state, and not what modern audiences would recognize as the psychological development that produces it. By playing Leontes in perfect bliss to start the play, McDermott evokes the powerful act of imagination we've all found ourselves committing in our deepest moments. What if I had that? He shows Leontes increasing his life so deeply that he has to fear its consequences and, in so doing, destroys it.

Nagle elegantly trains our focus on the precise moment of transition by having Polixenes, Hermione and Leontes join hands. It's a gesture that equates Leontes into mad suspicion, and serves during times when most directors would place him far away, watching the other two while giving room to his fears. By touching them together, Nagle makes us feel Leontes' pain even as we grasp its unreliability.

Michael Dean McDermott as Leontes

THE FINAL PRODUCT HAS THE PROFESSIONAL POLISH OF GIFTED ACTORS WORKING IN HARMONY.

Though Leontes' torture will deepen further, this is nonetheless a play of redemption through jealousy: the poison. The outside? Wise actresses who do good deeds. To produce his happy ending, Shakespeare tries three things that appear in none of his other plays: three second chance take-takes, he shows the dramatic sources of time and place overhead and calls for a 16-year interval in the middle of the play. The happy ending comes as his most clever coup de théâtre: a statue that comes to life. And he attempts a full genre mashup, combining a sad elegiac tale with a pastoral comedy.

Comic relief comes in all of Shakespeare's plays, but The Winter's Tale is something of a structural nightmare. Shakespeare suspends his fairy tale at its saddest point to bring on the clown, and the comedy then envelops a pastoral, romantic interlude. When we return to the fairy tale, the comic characters stand their ground and provide in a cheerful ending. It's an extremely difficult task for a director to make all these styles cohere.

Fortunately, Nagle has found a way. By shifting the style from straight drama to self-reflexual, direct engagement with the audience, he smoothly moves from tragedy to comedy. It seems so simple as having an actor do something funny, but Nagle wisely sets up these changes by letting us shift perspective before we give in to giggling.

The Vermont Shakespeare Company demonstrates the teamwork of its ensemble, with actors assembled from New York City and Vermont. Rehearsals for this production took place in both locations, yet the final product has the professional polished gifted actors working in harmony. It will take you a while to realize that only right performers handle the 16 roles.

In an impeccable performance, McDermott shows Leontes, a character who is truly painful on the page, not a complex man deserving of both compassion and contempt.

Molly Pratt Walsh's conversion as Hermione's friend, Paulina, makes us hold our breath, hoping she'll succeed in leading Leontes toward forgiveness. Walsh has a riveting physical and moral strength on stage, but she's just as capable of revealing on the role of the naïve Mopsa.

Maggie McDermott shows Hermione's ability without making her bitter or pathetic by focusing kindly on the character's need to believe that the truth can save her. McDermott's graceful movement is a pleasure to watch.

Mark Roberts handles the supporting role of Camillo with calm clarity, and then breaks out one of the park as the entertaining and enduring Old Shepherd. Roberts' vocal comic energy helps launch the play's transition from solemnity to humor.

Juggling four roles, Colin Smith is impressive in all, but he's a special delight as Cleon, the Old Shepherd's son and partner in teasing Leontes's physical energy, headless timing and gurgling confidence as Cleon's infantile antics are one of the most reliable sources of laughs.

Dean Leonard shines as Autolycus, a charming thief and scoundrel. He's faced with a lot of Shakespearean wordplay, but he shrills the humor for us with an expressive face and engaging physicality. When Nagle has him pick a pocket by removing the wallet, followed by the pants, we find ourselves loving the crime.

Marilee Anne Rousseau plays Leontes' young son with the bold freedom to muddle in the physical and vocal qualities of a child. Then she delights us as the leoness Perdita, cunning and fitting with equal gusto. Portraying young love takes a sweet line of message, and Rousseau conveys the intensity of it with subtle and self-memorable cues.

As the other young love, Florisel, Emily Smith is warm and adorable. Nagle stages the scene's moving Perdita and Florisel with the two in a constant motion, staying from near to far in pursuit and away until Leontes' pleasure in movement handsomely conveys the love he feels.

The costumes include some nice inventions, especially to accommodate the quick changes required for a small troupe filling many roles. Leontes' robe is needlessly understating in red, but Hermione's shimmering garments give a few hints of the statue she will become. All the comic characters get fun and foolish attire.

The sight of a lake breeze rippling Hermione's white dress makes us adore the setting as well as the play. When a peasant, and living your kids. If it's their first taste of Shakespeare, or poem, this production offers an opportunity to be arrested by the intensity of a moment in an imagined world. A child who realizes, for the first time, that this is how theater works will go to sleep that night with nerves in mind. B

Food Is Where the Heart Is

BY ALICE LEVITT

Charlie Menard

Chef: Charlie Menard
Company: Cooking From the Heart, catering at the Hotel du Pont and other local locations
Location: Westfield
Age of catering company: 20 years
Time at company: 14 years
Cuisine type: Seasonal and local that depends on the whims of the farmer and the cooking from the heart. "We try to really just get to the soul of it," says Menard.
Training: New England Culinary Institute followed by stints in South Carolina, Ohio and Scotland.
What's on the menu? Popular dishes include house-smoked salmon, beer-glazed lamb chops with potato wedges, and house-made breads and pastries.

Q&A: How did you start your career in food?

Oh! I grew up in Westfield. I was able to get my first job when I was 15, being a fish carrier for Gérard (Richard, now of Gérard's Bread). We were doing outside—it was a long time ago, long before anybody had heard of it. We were basically doing all the vacation parking and [selling fish] at different places. He had a store at Bloomingdale's in New York City, where they sold our place.

Gérard was such a French guy. He wanted everything to be like it was in France. He was hiring people to give opinions and raise issues. If he couldn't find the fish, he would create it.

He was really driven to create some of the best food anybody had seen in the Northeast, let alone in this small town in Vermont. Gérard brought over top chefs from France at the time, but he had [New England Culinary Institute] interns, too. One young chef, who was older than myself, came from NYC and told me, "If you want to cook, you want to go to my school."

As a high school student in Westfield, Charlie Menard was looking forward to the prom, but far from the highlight of the party would be doing at Le Chevrol d'Or in Jeffersonville. At the quaint French restaurant, situated in period costume several evenings to the impressive town. Menard made it through the dance, but what he really took away from the night was a gem to recreate: chef Yves Lefebvre's recipe. "I wanted to refine the flavor of that moment," explains Menard.

Now, as executive chef for Cooking From the Heart, the catering company at the Whitefield wedding destination, the Inn at Royal River Farm, Menard still occasionally pays homage to the long gone dishes at the Chevrol d'Or, but he's more often inspired by his own career, which has spanned the globe.

From clearing brackets out of freshly killed game in Scotland to preparing fish caught by a father-of-the-bride who happened to head a Fortune 500 company, Menard seems to have done it all. But it was just last week that he first appeared on the radar of many Vermonters.

On August 7, the Vermont Fresh Network announced that Menard had won the prize for Best Chef at its VFN Forum earlier that week. Among dishes from nearly 40 of the state's top chefs, Menard's duck offerings of bone-white chocolate ice cream with almond truffles, and street-corn ice cream with tomato jam, pears, and crushed kernel were a clear standout to the foodie audience.

Most of us would have to attend a private event at the Royal River to taste Menard's food, but he does feed guests at several public events each year, including an art show at the Royal River on September 22 and his annual Souper Bowl, a foodie alternative to the sugary football.

So what else is cooking for Menard? We grilled him to find out.

SEVEN DAYS: How did your family eat when you were growing up?

CHARLIE MENARD: Really simply. My mother and father did not farm, but they grew up on farms, so as family has farmed in Vermont for many generations. We always had vegetable gardens at home.

Some of my fondest memories of eating when I was little was just Mom going out and getting a head of lettuce from the garden and making a really simple masterpiece dressing with salt and pepper. No delicias, no smokes, so fresh. You remember that pure flavor forever.

As big as the Vermont Seafood & Fishery is, so is the new hotel.

Fishing for Names

YOU CAN HELP NAME BURLINGTON'S NEWEST HOTEL RESTAURANT.

HOTEL NORMAN'S JENNER is a hot, and the upcoming HEN OF THE HOUSE is sure to follow suit. New hotel owners Jay Canning and Chuck Deslauriers are hoping to spread their success to a third restaurant.

According to Canning, the PARK DATE in the MARRIOTT COMETARIO BURLINGTON (which he and Deslauriers also own, will soon undergo an extreme makeover. In November and December, Kim Doughty and her team at Truist Collins will remodel the hotel lobby and its restaurant with blues, lots of glass and a large, sculptural chandelier inspired by the catfish-like views. The Park's new menu would make it Burlington's first upscale seafood restaurant.

Chief WATER PROOFING already cooks specials featuring fish from MONSIEUR MARINER, and the regular menu includes lacustrine dishes such as crab cakes with new holland or leek and Bayley (then like cheese butter). But regional adventures and Vermont gyms menu will be the central theme of the new restaurant. "We want to focus more on that and get away from the traditional club sandwiches and such," Canning says.

With a winning plan in place, Canning is still on the hunt for a name to eye-rolling as that of his Hotel Vermont restaurant. And he's willing to shell out for the right choice, offering a "reward" of $500 for the name he selects.

Canning hints that he particularly likes single word monikers, such as Juniper and other Truist Collins projects, including Sip in Jackson, Hele, Wo, and left in Portsmouth, NH.

"Think you've got the right name for the fish-and-lobster-focused restaurant?" Email Canning and co. at noon noon@marriott.com before September 30 for consideration.

Food Is Where the Heart Is BY JILL

5D Back then, were there any foods you thought were gross?

CM: I did not like summer squash, and I still don't like it. I was definitely pretty open to trying everything. But I've also been kind of not the biggest meat eater since then. I really have moved to try refrigerated at home. I spent some time in high school as a vegetarian. I was kind of a hippie kid for a while. I guess I found [that eating out wasn't] another thing to learn about. I went vegan for a little while, too.

5D Name three foods that make life worth living.

CM: The first thing I think of is a paratha. That is number one. I love it. Oh, man. The reason I couldn't stay vegan was I loved cheese too much. And I love brislet. I love cooking it. I love eating it. I'm not a big steak guy, but I love brislet in my form.

5D What's the last thing you ate?

CM: I had some scrambled eggs with Cheddar [Hot Sauce].

5D What foods are always in your pantry?

CM: Rice, mostly basmati, pomegranate, Cheddar black beans, "00" flour for pizza. I have a pizza oven at home. It was built as part of a class with Yotam. That was really cool. Best thing I ever did for my house.

5D If you left Vermont, what local products would you miss most?

CM: Vermont beer. It's really about raising all the variety of all the great cream, honestly. Then I would miss the Vermont farmers market in general. I go to the farmers market every Saturday. I have missed life, three, over 13 years.

5D You're trying to impress somebody with your culinary prowess. What do you make?

CM: Cakes and sweet-bread ice cream. I like to make tart Tiramisu. It's a fun thing to make and a great thing to talk about, and it's just an amazing blend of sweet and savory and rich.

5D What's the dish you'll be remembered for?

CM: If I were to die right now, it would probably be my ice cream. Maybe the brislet.

5D What's the worst dish you've ever created?

CM: You try to block that out.

5D Describe your best meal ever.

CM: I had a tasting dinner at the Commons Inn [in Warren] of vegetarian and seafood. That would be tied with one I had recently in Rome at a Michelin-starred place, Micromisani.

5D And your worst.

CM: One thing that happens when you're a chef, people say, "Oh, I'm cooking for a chef, but they shouldn't be nervous. Especially in a home setting. You're in your own house and they cook for you... that's a beautiful, fabulous thing. That's what we do on a daily basis, and having it returned is beautiful."

But then, [there are times] you go and the food is awful. I can't come across, of 5D: What are your favorite Vermont restaurants?

CM: The Commons Inn, absolutely. I would love to be able to go back down to the Inn at Westfield. I think [chef] Jason Tostap is an amazing chef and not only I've been known to bring up the Mad Toss.

5D If money were no object, what kind of restaurant would you open?

CM: I would probably lean towards a gastropub. I love first food, the comforting, casual atmosphere, which I think is so Vermont. The sort of place you don't have to dress up for, but the food is amazing.

5D What's your favorite leverage?

CM: Beer. Yeah. I love beer. It's so good.

5D What kind of music do you like to listen to in the kitchen?

CM: Music of choice is Grateful Dead. Though it gets mixed up. Everybody has their own musical taste. Fortunately, the Grateful Dead is fairly well received.

5D If you weren't a chef, what would your job be?

CM: I would love to think that photojournalism would be really cool. I've always loved photography. I've also always had a pretty big interest in website design.

5D What are your hobbies?

CM: Taking care of my egg-laying hens in a daily hobby. Boring. I have an old Volkswagen Beetle that's kind of a hobby. I don't know what it is with these cars. People develop an emotional tie.

5D What's your most embarrassing favorite food?

CM: Sashimi. I don't know, what can I say, I do like it. I only got the veggie cheese because I don't really have any faith in the meat. It's not working for me [like having diet speakeasy food]. I keep trying to live up to him. In between the pork belly and porcetta and brislet at work, it hasn't evened out yet.

5D What do you think is the strangest thing about American food habits?

CM: Honestly, I feel like I'm kind of stuck in the place of Vermont, where I feel like we have really amazing habits. But it's better than the rest of the country, so it's hard for me to actually say what other people are doing in the rest of the country. Obviously, there's too much processed food and frozen food, but I live in a place where everybody goes to the farmers market and people love to cook. ☺ once again. They've opened Vermont Tap House in the space.

"We wanted to work with local farmers and brewers," says Sam Handy, who is returning to independent restaurant ownership along with his brothers. (The team also owns the South Burlington HOP and will soon open another in place of Midland's historic Midway Diner, which closes Sunday.) "We wanted to do something that was different from the chains out here," Handy explains.

The change is clear from the moment diners enter the Tap House. The walls are covered in big, colorful photos from Bethel's Imagination Company that portray farmers and brewers, many of whom supply the restaurant. In the wood-fired pizza oven are decorated with Vermont statework. "Everything here was purchased in Vermont," says Sam Handy — a choice that marks a 180-degree turn from the Pondwicks days.

Near the entrance, night-tap chime with names including GROUP-IN-BREWING COMPANY, FOODLAND-BREWING COMPANY and CHAMPLAIN BREWERY. The menu, too, means checks several acre farms, and designates as "local" items that may come from different suppliers on different days.

Appetizers include Emmentaler Bruschetta, which pairs local tomatoes with HANDELSON FINE OLIVES bruschetta on grilled bread. Papa's bruschetta features NOTY KAGEL FARM meat breaded to serve here and Parmesan. Sandwiches served on Italian style rolls from STEWART'S BAKERY, just down the road in Williston.

The rest of the menu is given over to the pizza offerings created by chefs BOB CAPONE and NAIL SARTER.

divided into Garlic & Butter, Red Sauce and Chef's Choice sections. The pies range from Simply Cheese and Margherita to uncommon pizzas such as the El Centro, topped with roasted corn, black beans, tomatoes, grilled chicken and olives.

The new spot has already attracted crowds. Since the Tap House opened last weekend, Sam Handy says, "Each day has been better than the last."

WINDSOR STATION RESTAURANT & BAR IS OPENING TO RESERVE THIS WEEK.

It's been a busy few months for STACY and JANAPOLINA since they sold their beloved Midland diner, STELLAS RESTAURANT, last winter. Before the ink on the contract was dry they were in the thick of purchasing a turn of the last century railroad station in Windsor that had housed a restaurant intermittently for decades. After an intense renovation, the Caposons now expect to reopen WINDSOR STATION RESTAURANT & BAR on 26 Depot Avenue by month's end.

"We're pumped. It's an architecturally cool, historically significant building," says Jan Caposon, who will manage from renovator to chef a few the doors open. "I've talked to so many people who've taken the train out of here."

Perhaps some of those same people will reappear as diners inside the 76-seat restaurant, with its rebuilt bar and menu that draws heavily on the Italian dishes Caposon has been itching to cook after six years of playing crochets and frozen stuffed clams, pan-seared pork chop Millenium with roasted plum tomatoes, and real Perdue with artichoke hearts and orange beignets are all on the bill of fare.

The Caposons will also have a healthy roster of pub food to complement the local beers they'll be tapping, including LOVE NATION BREWERY'S Soccer Wings, fried calamari and burgers — both meat and veggie — will join fried house macaroni, a haddock fish 'n' chips and a rib-eye steak or hearty, casual meals. "Most of the entrees fall between $12 and $18," Caposon notes.

Windsor Station is already a member of the VERMONT FRESH NETWORK, and the Caposons plan to tap farms in Hardland, Windsor and Wardsboro for some of their meat and produce. Their collaborations won't end there. Front-of-house manager Stacy Caposon has put together a menu of "farm to bar" cocktails, some of them drawing on local spirits such as the rye-corn OLD RUMOR, made just down the road.

The Caposons will initially serve dinner only six nights a week (closed Mondays), with lunch and brunch to appear later.

Sunrise Breakfast

Tasting the early shift at Henry's Diner

BY CYPRESS HARRIS

The light had a quality to which I was unaccustomed — holding in its still-misted rays, the day had not yet fully awakened. It was 6 a.m., and I was headed to Henry's Diner for breakfast. A crowd waited for dishes on Cherry Street near Church, but for the most part, the streets were empty. It was quiet, I was startled when a car honked in the distance.

Over the past few years, I have eaten at diners whenever I've had the chance — probably 25 just in the last year. I can't say this has been good for my health, but I'm too fascinated with them to stop. I don't think I'm alone.

Didi Barrett, the sociolinguist for New York's 100th district, made a tour of 11 diners this spring in an attempt to be accessible — or appear accessible — to her constituents. The tour captivated us what seems to be a widespread feeling that diners are quintessentially American.

But what is it that makes a diner a diner, and so particularly American? To whom did Barrett become accessible by making a tour of diners? And what makes someone who dines at a diner a "diner person"?

I pondered these questions as I headed, still groggy to Henry's to eat and take in the morning scene — a scene with a lot of history behind it.

The American Diner Museum, based in Providence, R.I., is devoted to celebrating the historical importance of diners. According to its website, the first diner was established in 1873 in Providence by Walter Scott. Out of a covered wagon, he Henry's Diner is back again.

I REMEMBER FEELING LIKE THE DINER WAS SHROUding ME, SHROUding ALL OF US, IN AN EASY QUIET AS WE ORDERED AND ATE OUR BREAKFASTS.

served "late night lunch" to customers who are sitting on the curb — imagine a late-19th-century food truck that catered to urban workers who had few other affordable dining options.

This initial operation led to other "rolling restaurants." When cities began placing restrictions on riding street vendors, the stationary dining car and the prefabricated diner were born.

Because diners had evolved from Scott's late-night-lunch wagon, they were generally considered inhospitable to women. However, by the time Henry Costum opened Henry's Diner in 1928, proprietors had begun to try to attract the ladies — which the modern Henry's notes on its website. Costum added feminine touches, putting waffles on the menu and attaching flower boxes to the windows.

The Jerry O'Mahoney Diner Company

manufactured Costum's dining car. The O'Mahoney Company — whose slogan was "In Our Line We Lead the World" — was one of the largest diner manufacturers and operated from 1913 to 1956. Andrew Harley explains in his book, Diners, Bowling Alleys, and Trailer Parks: Changing the American Dream in Post War Consumer Culture, that the O'Mahoney Company was especially innovative in design following World War II — experimenting with new materials and incorporating integrated ceilings to create an illusion of space and luxury. After the war, diners became sleeker in design, reflecting the "futuristic" aesthetics of the time.

The rapid population growth of the postwar era resulted in a proliferation of diners. An advertisement for O'Mahoney dining cars from the 1940s capitalized on the changing American landscape: "Desirable locations are plentiful. Hundreds of miles of new highways and automobile routes throughout the country await the establishment of these modern eating places," it hailed. While diners had initially opened in cities to provide meals for industrial workers, they were marketed as part of the new middle class American landscape.

By 1968, when a fire forced Henry's then-owners Frank and Roberta Goldenstein to close and rebuild, the diner had already undergone a number of structural changes. Today, virtually the entire original dining car is gone — there's a grain storage facility, an exterior kiosk of a dining car inside, however, the original carved skeleton is still visible.

During the 1970s, as fast-food restaurants became increasingly popular, many diners built up around their original structures and tried to pass on family restaurants rather than unflashy "greasy spoons." The American Diner Museum explains that this led to the destruction of many dining cars.

Nanni and Tull Magliari have owned Henry's Diner since 2005 and have added Greek twists to the menu. The Burlington Free Press recently reported that the couple also owns Athens Diner in South Burlington and, with Bob Campolongo, the Apollo Diner in Milton, Athens Diner in St. Albans and Athens Diner in Colchester.

Sitting at the counter, I ordered French toast and watched the cook. He whisked while laying bacon out on the grill, dipping bread into an egg mixture and using a device that deposits butter into perfectly round pancakes with the push of a lever. Flavored to the sound of coffee being brewed, plates being set on the counter and of the two young tourists next to me speaking in French.

An older man, reading a newspaper, sat at the booth closest to the door and seemed to be exceedingly comfortable. Unprompted, he directed people to the bathroom, and when a couple paused for a moment at the door, he told them they could sit down: "Wherever's fine."

When the waitress had a free moment, she shared with the man about a vacation she's planning to Mexico, and the weather.

The cook stretched my French toast into a pile and cut through it with his spatula. A moment later, I was eating. The tourists next to me finished their food and got ready to leave. In a booth, another young couple leaned toward me another across their breakfast. I felt like an unwanted guest, an intruder into the goings-on of this very early morning.

Yet, I've been to diners in the very early morning before. I've been one half of a young couple, still awake from the night before and going out for breakfast. I have not, sleepily, on sticky vinyl booths in a diner full of nannies. I remember feeling like the diner was watching me, shedding all of us, in an easy quiet as we ordered and ate our breakfast. In my education, I was comforted by the unassuming anonymity of the diner — and by the ease of ordering, the speed with which the food came, and how little was demanded of me.

Time feeling made me reluctant to interrupt the quiet of anyone else's very early morning. So I finished my French toast, paid and left without making conversation with anyone.

I returned to Henry's the next morning. Outside it was raining, and inside there was the feeling of camaraderie that had weathered. Two men began talking about the porkchop sauce they intended to grilling up; the Talking Heads; the Clash; the Ramones.

The man who had been sitting in the first booth reading the day before was sitting there again. After ordering my eggs, I turned around to talk to him. His name is Dean Dennis, and he's been eating breakfast — most often "three eggs, three sausages, toast and that's it" — at Henry's for years.

Dennis usually arrives right when the diner opens. "I have my breakfast and then I go about my busy day," he told me. Grand what? "Some days it's taking my granddaughter to school, and some days it's helping those guys from heating up a little gas in the park," he said as two police officers passed us, walking toward the register. The cops jokingly threatened that they'd prevent him from buying a new truck. "Well, sorry," Dennis said with a chuckle.

Edna Dennis, the waitress working that morning, told me she likes opening because it's "powerful" and because she gets to know the customers who come in early. It's usually just these regulars — "lonies," she says, laughing. "It's a holiday and drunk people have ended up sleeping outside waiting for me to open."

On these days, there's space for them, too, in a booth or at the counter under the still-rendered ceiling of the old CrMabury dining car. ☺

Jam Session

The town of Peacham is synonymous with rolling hills, white-striped churches and — the Peacham Acoustic Music Festival. For two days, notable musicians including black legends Bill Brann Jr. and Matthew Skaife (pictured right) descend on the village with infectious melodies and a collective expertise. Music lovers take note: attending dances, women workshops, the famed "band scramble" and step-dance that last into the night. Local shops such as Chickadee, the Bayley House Bays and Fish House (pictured, above) at Catamount Crossing join national artists in this multi-genre gathering, where intimate performances range from old-time fiddle tunes to Celtic traditions.

Getting Personal

Award-winning writer Howard Norman has made a career of his ability to translate real-life experiences onto the page. A high school dropout, he worked among Dine Indians before earning degrees in sociology, English, linguistics and folklore. In his recently released memoir, I Hate to Leave This Beautiful Place, five sections — each focused on a life-changing event — serve as organizational tools for untidying prose. This no-nonsense narrative spans decades and travels as far as the Canadian Arctic to reconcile the ways in which violence, dreams and death translate into lessons for living.

Opposites Attract

An IRS agent seeking unpaid taxes from a family living off the grid in the New Mexican desert does not seem like the makings of a lasting friendship. In Jean Acherson's evocative play Off the Map, however, the unlikely pairing proves to be the saving grace for both parties. Narrated by its Graham, the plot vacillates between the present and the unlikely summer of her youth when the unannounced visitor fell ill and moved in with her family. Themes of love, depression and self-discovery drive this endearing production presented by the St. Johnsbury Players under the direction of Sarah Bengtson.

The Bohemian Beat

In 1990, the Black Crowes exploded onto the scene with their multi-platinum debut, Shake Your Money Maker. More than 20 years later, the psychedelic rockers forever linked to the hit singles "Hard to Handle" and "She Talks to Angels" are still at it. Led by charismatic front man Chris Robinson, the band's raucous live shows feature a varied musical mix. Hints of gospel, funk and soul inform a decidedly 1970s roots-rock vibe. Fresh off a recent hiatus and the release of their live album Where for the Time, the southern boys travel north to headline the Lake Champlain MusicFest Festival.

Vermont's surf-rock mavericks make waves

BY JOHN FLAMMENG

Just past the halfway point in Five Pack With Me, David Lynch's 1993 full-length prog-rock/psychedelic-influenced "Thriller," Laura Palmer, the semi-protagonist, cokes out with a guy named Buck and then drops her head. Donna is a stretch-like nightclub where a "full-on" band, so Lynch's script describes it, is playing "like Frank." The song is a dark, pulsing drone as the voice of surf music, but strong on the voice of the scene itself, muffled rancors below laissez-faire and wacky twang.

Guitarist Matt Hagen hopes to capture this particular mood with his new surf-rock venture, the High Fivez. The band plays a Surf Rock Sunset Cruise aboard the Lake Champlain Ferry this Saturday, August 17.

"These things happen one night now," Hagen said prior to a recent show at the Monkey House in Winslow. "Surf music for cinema, spaghetti Western for film and David Lynch movies for aesthetic."

The High Fivez, which debuted at this year's Burlington Discover Jazz Festival and features the members of local pop-rockers Lendrum, are the latest in a string of surf-rock bands in Vermont. While Burlington-based "surf-rock" legends Barbosco have been at it since the early 1960s, in recent years bands such as Burlington's Torpedo Rocker and Montpelier's Concrete Revs have local drive-in, punk-and-metal-inflected sets with the gritty surf sound.

And there is more fresh blood in the water. In addition to the High Fivez, Veterans of Oak, a Burlington band known more for doomy direct metal, this week are poised to release S1987, an EP of doom-doom-inspired songs.

A lot of catching up Surf music proliferated for a short period in the early 1960s along the beaches of Southern California. Dick Dale, the self-proclaimed—and generally agreed upon—"King of the surf guitar," would hold court with his Del-Tone at the Rendezvous Ballroom in Helios, Calif., scoring scores of beachside isolates to twang up and revel in the mealy, Middle Eastern scales of "Mickey," "Let's Go Trippers" and other Dale classics. Bands including the Lonely Ones, the Bel-Airs, the Challengers and Eddie & the throwback scene emerged, matching the intensity of surfing by channeling its requisite balance and speed.

Surf's popularity waned when British Invasion bands took over and looser, bluesier guitar styles fell into favor. The genre lived on through film, notably in the James Bond theme song — placed into posterity by Vic Fick — and in the Ramo Mercurio movie for Sergio Leone. The Poly Phonic Soundtrack revived surf in the 1990s, capturing the essential mood for Quentin Tarantino's kind eyes.

Despite the genre's inherent playfulness, the High Fivez are quite serious about pursuing down a precise mood and offering audiences something both aesthetic and pervasive. Between songs, Hagen, who matched his bandmates in a slick gray suit, black shoes, a slick black tie and black Wayfarers, set up such narratives as the exotic exchanges between grime of sand on a beach and two lovers strolling seaside by a date.

After introducing themselves at the Monkey House ("Yo, we're the High Fivez, and we're from wherever it is you want us to be from"), Hagen and the band took time before launching into the first song, rilling around cautiously for a moment and then finally catching the right synchronicity and dropping in.

The sparse, enthusiastic audience included Barbosco member Bill Mullins, Vermont's reigning king of the surf guitar, upon whose toes Hagen said he hopes to avoid stepping. Lonely Mullins, who also plays in local punk bands the Porcupine Crows and, blundered, has been spending his winters in Austin, Texas, and Hagen responded a "surf road" that he was happy to fill. Mullins isn't worried about his toes.

"Plenty of rooms on the beach," he said. Barbosco and the High Fivez will split a bill at Nectar's on Friday, August 24, with support from another local band with occasional surf tendencies, the Blueflares.

Barbosco, whose current lineup includes Mullins and Lowell Thompson on guitar, Kirk Flanagan on bass and Jeremy Friedman on drums, spent a practiced complexity that the genre demands.

"Surf is hard to play," Mullins acknowledged. He explained that landing the right narrative while controlling a provocative melody is essential to a good, instrumental surf song.

Concrete Revs guitarist Jay Elias concurred. He's been interested in the genre and its complexities since he began playing, learning the early '60s "Ghost Riders in the Sky" immediately upon acquiring a guitar.

"I was playing the guitar, so I figured, why not try to play the type of music that highlights the instrument the most?" Elias said over beers at Three Penny Taproom in Montpelier.

The signature surf drumbeat is another technical requisite. David next to Elias, Torpedo Rocker drummer Jeremiah Johnson noted that while the typical "boom-bat-boom-bat" beat can feel restrictive, it keeps the occasional flashy drummer in line and complements the song rather than the individual musician's chops.

"It's a relief to bring that expectation in place," Johnson said.

VOC guitarist Justin Goyette doesn't take the genre's technical challenges lightly, either. He said his band's surf project was inspired by his own "desire to be a better player." Goyette added that surf music shares a territory with metal, his band's usual offering. Dick Dale was in some ways the "first metal guitarist," Goyette said.

VOC's new EP presents a chunk, heavy surf style with blistering guitar lines that pay homage to the genre's pioneers without copying them directly.

Elias and Johnson are both excited about the proliferating surf scene in the Green Mountains. Elias said he hopes the newer bands help solidify a "signature Vermont surf sound," while Johnson looks forward to more extreme sounds filling in as the jet and flask din associated with Vermont continues to, as he put it, "relinquish to beach."

Regardless of the direction surf music might take in Vermont, watching lead-banded bands develop the genre — with coastal relevance completely excused — is wholesome, postcardish fun. ☺

For a Good Maritime, Call...

The big to-do on the local scene tip this weekend is undoubtedly the seventh annual Lake Champlain Maritime Festival, which runs all at points all along the Burlington waterfront this Thursday, August 15, and runs through Sunday, August 16. Anchoring this year's festivities are the BLACK CRONES who are... well, they're the fucking Black Crones. Do you realized as to how convener you to check them out? I don't think so.

For the purposes of this column, I'm more concerned with tipping you to the wealth of free, local music on offer during the day throughout the weekend on the festival's various stages. After all, the LCMP was recently named a "Top 100 North American Event" by the American Music Association, so it's kind of a big deal. Also, this just in: There is something called the American Music Association. Such as that, Canadian babes.

Anyhow, let's break it down day by day, shall we?

Things kick off Thursday at Breakwater Cafe with "A Night of Americana," which is part of something called New-Profile Palooza. The concert features music from the AWAYONES, AWAY and a few other special guests who appeared on the recently released COTS benefit CD: Harmonies for Humanity, Vol. 2.

On Friday, August 16, the bulk of LCMP's Free Concert Series goes under way on two stages. On the Festival Stage at Waterfront Park, folk rock rules the day, highlighted by appearances from WILL COLOUBOURG, the ASHES & RAIN, PAULINE PETERBOROUGH and AARON FLANK's THIRD OR. Meanwhile, on the nearby Great Lakes Stage, catch up with our old pal GREASY SQUAD, who headlines a lineup that also includes songwriters JOSHUA BLAKE, DARIN STICKLE and CLARA WARREN, among others.

Things get a little louder on Saturday, August 17. On the Festival Stage, tune in to acts from SWILL, JOHN FERRY BAND, NICHOLE TERRY BAND, JOHN PARRA and CRACKLEBERRY—the last of whom beat one of my all-time favorite local band names.

On the Great Lakes Stage, mellow out with acoustic acts by country rocker IAN BUCK, PIKE HENRY, LEA HARRIS and JOHN FERRY.

If you're only going to make one day of the LCMP, I'd suggest the Sunday, which leads in by the most star-studded of the bunch. The Festival Stage alone features five of my personal favorite local acts, including WILLA CHASE, SCOTT TERRY, the BURN BURN—led by the critically-acclaimed BLAKE CHASE—and a pair of local rock/country bands VT and godfather, BARBARA and the sons of alba—and wrap-up, the black howlers. (See the story on local surf bands on page 66.) Also on the bill are country rockers MANHATTAN. But, as my brother-in-law (and band's boost, you don't hear that from me).

Over on the Great Lakes Stage, it's still more acoustic fare, with appearances by JUSTIN LEVINGRA, BRETT BROWN and TONY CAPLAN, OSCAR HANSEN and several others.

For set times and more general info about the LCMP, visit lcmf.org.

BiteTorrent

The LCMP isn't the only interesting music festival this weekend. The annual Peaches Acoustic Music Festival is set for Friday, August 16, and Saturday, August 17, at locations around...

Peaches. As always, the two-day fest features a wide array of workshops, dances and family-friendly activities, as well as some great music. This year's lineup is highlighted by the likes of ATLANTIC CREWING, WINDAGE & COUNTRY, CRISTINA, WINE AND THE WINDMILLS and Grammy-nominated blues masters MAITHEW WALKER and WILLIAMS JR. Check our parentfest.com for the full schedule and list of performers.

Meanwhile, in Vergennes, the Basin Harbor Club is hosting the RHQ Business this Saturday, August 17. The daylong fest will feature an, um, bouquet of RHQ, beer and bands. Ritzy! Said bands include the WUPONY BROTHERS, PATRICK PETERBOROUGH, SEASON AMERICAN, AARON FLANK and WAGON-SPICE. Check out basinharbor.com for full details.

While we're on the festival beat, Radio Run is hosting a mini-fest in its camp grounds this Friday, August 16, called Don't Be Bored in the Water. Granted by local chaos posters, WATER, the lineup features some pretty awesome two-piece bands, including Montreal-based electro-pop duo WAGON-SPICE and local gosh-dawd duo PRIMA. (Obligatory note to Primapop: Finish your damned album already! Amen.)

Speaking of chaos, it's been a while since we've heard from Daunt, old Canadian country stars RYAN THE ROSS, who have recently disappeared under just because they need some cash and don't want their whereabouts known." Got it? Me neither. That's just what we'll be revealed when MudRock play had begun this Friday, August 10, or not.

Guitar geeks, rejoice! This Saturday, August 12, the historic Pond Studios is hosting a guitar show and exhibition featuring three of the area's premier guitar builders, all of whom take radically different approaches to the instrument. On display will be set up up men built by ARON BAKER of Blue Belly Guitars, acoustic guitar and banjos from ADAM BURCHARD of Circle Strings and a slew of custom electric guitars from CHRISTOPHER LEE of Creston Electric Instruments. Oh, yeah, also appearing are Wayne Spauld, who collectively play four Creston guitars and one Blue Belly. How's that for listeners?

In media news, congrats to local independent FM radio station 104.7 FM the Power, which won Station of the Year honors at the Triple A Music Conference in Boulder, Colo., last week-end. That's doubly cool since it's the first time the station has snagged that award since longtime local radio DJ DAVE LARSON took over as the station's music director.

In 2002, local guitarist ARON PRATT, a fixture in Montpelier's hardware scene in the 1990s and later a member of CONCRETE JUNGLE as well as the sound guy at 242 Main in Burlington, was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis. During his past five years of treatment, he's continued to play, in spite of his debilitating disease. But those treatments, coupled with endless battles with insurance companies over coverage, have left Pratt at a financial hole. So his old friends are throwing a benefit bash this Saturday, August 12, at Positive Pla 2 in Montpelier. A monster jam session will include players from SHRIMP, UNIVERSITY OF THE PEOPLE and DYEDRUM, and there will be appearances by the BLUES BAND, EDWIN P. TON, BARNEY CHERRY, SHAWN and the ACADEMY.

Last but not least, the second annual "90" Show Memorial Don and Benefit Concert is slated for this Saturday, August 12, at the Abbey Park in Sheldon. The concert, which features "The Voice" contestant JOY TAYLOR, Nashville guitarist FOREST LEE JR. and Vermont country band DAVE BAKER, is a memorial tribute to late Missouai Valley Union High School music teacher DAVID SCHWABER, who died of cancer in 2003. Here's a neat note about Gundersen: Among many other interesting life facts, he was a founding member and keyboardist of the band WICKED LETTER, a NYC-based rock band active in the early 1970s that included a couple of guys named BOB DYLAN and STANLEY CUBER. After Gundersen left Wicked Letter in 1974, Klein and Eisen would change their names to BOB DYLAN and PAUL CUBER, respectively. Maybe you've heard of them? (Hint: They sounded like J.) For more info on the show, check out www.musicalvibe.com. ☺

The Stone Cold Roosters, Back in the Bog

(SELF-RELEASED | DIGITAL DOWNLOAD)

Pretty much everything you need to know about the Stone Cold Roosters can be gleaned from two songs, placed back to back and nestled midway through the local supergroup's recently released third record, Back in the Bog. The one-two punch of "Last Call" and "Living in a Country Song" represent the dusty, rootsy essence of this new collection of Vermont players, lighting up the record like a burning beer sign in the window of a roadside barbershop.

"Last Call," penned by guitarist Ted Martner, crackles with raucous bluegrass swing as band leader Coffin McGuffey croons in his classic baritone, "Well, I guess the party's over, and it's time to say good night." "They'll be closing up this honky-tonk, and turning out the lights," he continues, nodding at Chuck Owens as Chuck Elder's piano phibs wobble in the background like then lanterns, "but the band is playing soft and low, so let's hoot one last dance." Then though we know that it's best not call for extra rancor, The song could almost work as a prelude to O'Brien's classic "Close Up the Honky Tonks." At the very least, it's a pitch-perfect homage to the era and style, sounding like it could have come out of a Southern California roadhouse in the late 1950s rather than McGuffey's cozy central Vermont studio in 2013.

Where "Last Call" trades on bleary-eyed melancholy, the ballad "Living in a Country Song," written by local Casey Deems, compels with smart, self-aware humor that owes as much debt to George Jones as Johnny Paycheck. For a group of middle-class, middle-aged Vermonters to sing wistfully about "drinking hard-rock bottles," "honky-tonks every Saturday night," and going to "church every Sunday, to make it all right" is a bit of a put on, but, given their reluctance to emerge, it's an inviting rose and one that highlights the band's genuine appeal.

These songs are but two standouts on a record full of them. From the swirly, folkie-fueled fire of the title track and "Forget About the South" to the rolling, down-home groove of "It Ain't No, It's Me" to the cheeky, wacky, wacky shuffle of "Nothin' But," the Stone Cold Roosters pay tribute to regional honky-tonk tunes with expert ability and sensitivity, and that's to say nothing of the record's show-stopping ballads. In particular, album closer "You'll Tell Me Mine" is a tender, heartwarming love song that Don Williams himself would have been proud to claim.

Given the band's pedigree — it also includes fiddler The Aghwens, drummer Ray Carter and pedal steel player Jim Wilson — it's no surprise that the Stone Cold Roosters' third record is good. But no one could have predicted the sheer honky-tonk greatness embodied in Back in the Bog. The Stone Cold Roosters is available at colby.com.

Cloudeyes, Arifal EP

(SELF-RELEASED | DIGITAL DOWNLOAD)

In a recent email to Seven Days introducing his band as sophomores EP, Arifal, Cloudeyes guitarist James Christensen wrote that despite recent lineup changes, "one thing we still seem to do is deceptively write thunderous riffs." Christensen was referring to the difference between the new recording and Cloudeyes' debut, Genibear, which was closer to the math-rock and often subvert post-rock spectrum than is their latest, more ethereal release. But he's selling his band short. Cloudeyes, which includes drummer Jay Steinhaus and bassist/microDJ player/poet/poet/poet and singer Austin Gaynes, do indeed write thunderous riffs. But they're also things presaged by lightning. And those floating, wavy chords, coupled with lingering folk-like coils of emotion, make Arifal a dark, brooding and cathartic work.

Though divided into four movements, Arifal conceivably works as one larger suite. In the span of 12 seamlessly flowing minutes, Cloudeyes alternately attack and release the resulting sounds are haunting and compelling in equal measure.

The piece opens with "Canary Assembly." Dark, distorted guitar gathers on the horizon, a quiet rumble made into notes by droning flashes of percussion that strike from a distance, igniting the gathering cloud wall. It's a softly aching storm that unleashes in a swirl of gritty, swirling noise. But so quickly as it hits, the machines abate, leaving only glimmering disjuncts of synths and guitar, and mumbled bass, gently transitioning into "Death Before a Name."

Peace here, it seems as though the storm has passed and we're watching it from behind as Christensen's spirals of high-tuned guitar announce more distant plots. But any grade schooler knows that lightning can strike from miles away. And it does here, as another torrent of rolling distortion explodes, then fades in a clattering mesh of delicate guitar work that traces the next movement, "Doldrums."

Christensen notes that Arifal is thematically based on the emotional trauma of a breakup and the subsequent resolution that "we live for ourselves." On "Doldrums," it seems he's moved past the anger and uncertainty of the immediate post-breakup aftermath and is looking toward. The math-rock intricacies of the band's debut resurface and mingle with Cloudeyes' newfound atmosphere, ultimately reconsidering on the gently comforting and well-earned closing segment, "It Is Her Serenity Which Gilded Him the Most."

Cloudeyes play the Higher Ground Showroom Lounge in South Burlington on Wednesday at 8 p.m. at their Friday, August 16. Arifal is available at cloudeyes.bandcamp.com.

"Exposed," Helen Day Art Center

One of the best things about "Exposed," Helen Day Art Center's annual outdoor sculpture show, is that it's outdoors. Given the occasional vandalism and thefts over the years, the gallery deserves props for just doing it. And for making the formidable effort to site nearly 30 works in the gallery's lawn, around the village of Steers and along side the town's main road path. On a gorgeous summer day, taking in this sprawling exhibit makes for a stimulating stroll regardless of what one thinks of the artwork on route.

As it happens, though, the majority of pieces in this year's "Exposed," curated by Rachel Moore, merit stopping for a closer look—and later. Doing a number on your cell gets you a brief artist statement for each work. This may or may not tell you something you can't see for yourself, but it's a nice option.

The risk of selecting works for this exhibit is that not every sculpture can stand up to the distractions outside; some would likely garner more attention in a white box gallery. This could be said of Eleanor Latta's "The Matter of Memory" pieces, which appear in several locations. The works—such as lawn-to-the-ground plaques square with a QR code atop it—are potentially more engaging conceptually than visually. But if you haven't installed a QR code reader on your phone, you won't know that you can "leave a memory behind" with the Matter of Memory app—which also must be downloaded. But continue, even tech-savvy viewers might find this cerebral activity too much trouble.

Success in "Exposed" can be defined by one of two qualities: The work is strong enough to render location irrelevant, or it appears precisely because of how it engages with the outdoors. As space problems evaluating all of the entries, here are three of the best pieces in each category.

LOCATION IRRELEVANT

James Irving Wittenmann's large scale, leaf sphere is ingenious on several levels. For one, it's constructed from recycled bicycle tires. Second, how Wittenmann compressed them into an elegant sphere is a captivating mystery. And third, the piece looks light and airy even though it's made of metal. The hollow steel beams upon which it sits are oval, though the sphere could sit cradled on the ground, or rest to engage in a beach ball.

Judith Wrona's geometric, two-pronged abstract sculpture juts upward authoritatively, commanding attention not just for its signature bright red, saturated finish paint job but for its insistent presence in the world. Steel sent to a sidewalk in downtown Steers, Wrona's piece is aptly named "Attraction." Colleen Bada's "Encounter (Wolf & Dog)" on the gallery's front lawn, is a standoff of the two creatures that evokes surprising drama. Its doll fashioned her dog with eyes back and tail erect, the animal looks alert, uncertain, but willing to wag. The wolf's tail hangs down as the creature gazes steadily at the dog. Not as anthropomorphic, but the expression on its face might be read as indifference toward its more domesticated rival. Placed some 15 feet apart, the animals are locked in an evolutionary tension.

ENGAGES WITH THE OUTDOORS

Also on the gallery lawn, Edan Bond Warr's "Seed 21" is literally horizontal, at least in part. His elliptical steel structure is fuzzy with green grass and the occasional miniature nasturtium, this plant ed within the fern with the assistance of soil and barley. According to a description, an invisible irrigation system maintains the sculpture's plant life and the job-like surface of the whole piece matches conception to function. No word on whether Bond/Warr employs a top lawnmower to maintain his very abstraction.

Art: Edan Bond Warr

Sue G Gray calls her work "Looking East, 5 Degrees North," but the structure, steel slat but facing away from the north, is more emotionally resonant than that geographical title would suggest. That's because the hand-shaped slat, quartered, loosely formed with bent willow branches and covered with native plants, looks like three tree stumps for sitting. And so soon as you enter and take a seat, you project on the space the narrative that suits you. Whether that's playhouse or bus stop or gazebo, the structure engenders a sense of privacy and intimacy, and by extension a loneliness for the natural materials that embrace you. But Gray's simple structure is not just methodically pleasing; it is an entire manipulation of the very idea of shelter.

Edan Bond Warr's work, aptly titled "Gut," is an anomaly in "Exposed," and when you come upon it you wonder why the exhibit does not attract more

Andy Goldsworthy-esque, temporary art such as this. Bennett's striking creation is an "installation" by virtue of deletion. He cleared a straight, narrow channel through a copse of trees and lined its footpath with red mulch. This immediately floats the art-less abstraction that there are no straight lines in nature. At the end of the path, perhaps 30 feet away, there is a wooden, like the power but light at the end of the tunnel—or the light that awaits us upon both birth and death. Or is this about human imposition of rigid linearity (aka "development") on the natural world?

"Gut" evokes multiple associations, but its greatest pleasure is experiential. Bennett invites viewers to walk the path and observe how this simple but symbolic alteration of the environment feels. Oddly, it is the opposite of exposed.

Zelde Grimm Burlington artist Zelde Grimm's ink drawings have a storybook quality to them—and it's no wonder, considering her background. According to her Blog profile, after leaving home at 12, Grimm spent much of her early adult life hitchhiking around the country, stopping occasionally to join crosses. Grimm's artwork is needed, like a refined double dose in the delirium of high school math class, but also tinged with enchantment, like an illustration in a fantasy novel. Share the Power of Family

There are over 10 million children in foster care. Howard Center serves a special set of kids with more distinct behavioral and social needs. They need more love, more patience and more attention, and they need it in a calm, supportive family setting.

Howard Center is looking for a family or individual to provide respite for a 10 year old boy one or two weekends per month.

"Adam says that he loves not school, would like to be in a home with other children and likes to go bowling, play cards and Words 121 on the Xbox. These close to him describe Adam as a "cool" kid. Adam has been in foster care since he was 10 months old. He enjoys playing outside, riding bikes, swimming and playing on the computer."

Ross Sheehan Vermont artist Ross Sheehan, who co-owns Vergennes' Dandelion Gallery, describes his new body of volcano-themed paintings and sculptures as "non-expressive, poetic." The exhibit, titled "Cinders and Gases," is on view at Otter Creek Framing in Middlebury through September 13. Sheehan playfully combines heavy oil paint, enamel, ink, mixed metal, mortar and steel dust in his creations, simultaneously evoking the wild danger and boiling rage pre-adolescent science project and real volcanoes' spectacularly devastating effects. Curses, Follies Again

Blair's depiction having robbery suspect Matthew Oliver in Prince County, Fla., posted his wanted picture on their Facebook page, naming him their "Bugman of the Day." Oliver replied, posting dozens of comments, along with his photo and personal details, including his address. Insisting he was set up by a "cruel head," Oliver elicited such comments as, "Ur rooms from the pope & post on your picture? Lol." Dupont arrested Oliver leaving his apartment (Tampa Bay's WTSP-TV).

Snoop Proof

Russia's Federal Protective Service offered to pay $25,000 for 20 typewriters. The agency, a KGB successor assigned to protect President Vladimir Putin and other top officials, explained that it began using typewriters after Edward Snowden's disclosure about U.S. National Security Agency secret surveillance to print drafts of official documents intended for Putin. (Associated Press)

Thanks for Nothing

To point out to voters how much Canada's Conservatives are doing to improve life for disabled citizens, the party mass mailed a flyer headlined "Supporting Jobs for All Canadians." It repeated these words in a series of bubble text. Only instead of being raised, the dots were printed on the fly-er's flat surface, making them unreadable to blind people. Jon Tolson of the Canadian Council of the Blind called the flyer "bullshit" (Toronto Star).

Second-Amendment Follies

Police reported that a man in a golf shirt dropped by his home in San Antonio, Texas, while he was with his current girlfriend. During the ensuing argument, the man aimed a gun at the eight-year-old but accidentally shot the current girlfriend in the chest. She was hospitalized in critical condition, the eight-year-old wasn't injured. (San Antonio's KNAV-TV)

Charged with killing a 5-year-old girl with an assault rifle, Ron Andrew Meyer Jr. explained that the rapid-fire weapons fired accidentally while he was using it as a crutch to help him stand up from a couch while visiting a friend in Grants Pass, Ore. The fully automatic weapons fired out of control, one burst blasted through the ceiling, killing the girl and wounding an adult with her. (Grants Pass Daily Courier)

First Is Worst

First-class airline passengers are nine times more damaging to the environment than coach passengers, according to a study by the World Bank. The report noted that first-class seats are bigger than other ones, meaning planes can hold fewer people, thereby requiring more fuel per passenger to fly and increasing carbon emissions. First-class passengers are also heavier to boot, even luggage per person, requiring even more fuel. The report calculated that average coach passengers burn a 0.76 carbon footprint, business-class passengers 2.30 and first-class passengers a 3.69 (Toronto's Daily Star).

Cursive's Last Gasp

Two German entrepreneurs invented an ink pen that recognizes misspelled words and had handwriting. Its name is Lernzettel, German for "learning pen," according to Daniel Kossomache, co-founder of the company that spent 15 months developing the digital pen. It's a regular pen with metal ink, but also contains a tiny motion sensor and a battery-powered Linux computer with a Wi-Fi chip. "The pen will have two functions," Kossomache said, "calligraphy and orthography mode." In the spelling mode, the computer compares words it writes to its language database, when it doesn't recognize a word, it vibrates. If it senses bad letter formation or messy handwriting, it also vibrates. The company intends testing the digital pen with a whole school class before selling it, for 180 to 250 euros ($170-$280). The device will work with smartphones and tablets eventually, but its "basic functionality is all in the pen," Kossomache said, pointing out "there's no app needed" or special paper. (ABC News)

You Be the Judge

Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Karen Mould ordered Arnan Samson to stand trial for manslaughter in the deaths of two women who tried to rescue him after he crashed his sport utility vehicle into a utility pole and a fire hydrant. From Samson and Mould's defense were killed when they stepped into a pool of water that had been electrified by 4800 volts from the fallen power line. Mould said Samson, 20, "was definitely driving negligently" but defense attorney Andrew Flax argued that "his client couldn't have foreseen the 'intervening act' once he crashed and that the victims should have known the dangers created by downed power lines and standing water. (Los Angeles Times)

Do the Math

Several students at Virginia's George Mason University signed a petition urging the legislation of fourth-grader abortion "too that women have a choice," according to Dan Joseph of the conservative Media Research Center, who circulated the petition (CampusReform.org).

Leo

[July 23-Aug. 22]

"The secret of change is to focus all of your energy, not on fighting the old, but on building the new."

When I came across that quote while writing the web, I felt that it gelled perfectly with the astrological essence that we currently in play for you. Every minute I considered agreed that the speaker of this wisdom was Socrates, but I thought the language sounded too contemporary to have been uttered by a Greek philosopher who died 3400 years ago. After a bit of research, I found the real source, a character named Socrates in Way of the Zenful Warrior, a New Age self-help book by Dan Millman. I hope this doesn't dilute the impact of the quote for you, Leo. For sure, it is crucial that you not get bogged down in quarreling and bickering. You need to devote all your energy to creating the future.

that the probability you receive may only come later AFTER THE DUST HAS SETTLED

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) William Turner was a 19th century English landscape painter born under the sign of Taurus. He was even not to capture scenes in reality but instead rather to convey the emotional impact they made on him. He believed that an eye recorder he had painted told of the mood of a ship during a storm, so he could experience that ship without leaving. The result was "Rain, Steam, & Great Trains" off a "Hornet's Mouth" a painting depicting many of the steamships sailing. What would be the equivalent for you Taurus? I'm trying to think of a way you could do perfectly safe, so you could pursue it up close encounter with elemental energies.

GEMINI (May 21-June 21) Some years back, the Greek government launched a huge anti-smoking campaign in an expensive way, using a model. When my daughter was 6 years old, I initiated a crusade to ban Barbie dolls from our home. Since she was enjoying real pictures of the famous non-smoking son from my catalog and leaving from an ink dog, little events at school, she was having classes about trying to tell you into becoming a five-year-old. My daughter instead I should encourage you to think small and obvious on breaking waters.

CANCER (June 22-July 23) "Wings are a constant that makes it possible to fly," the Canadian poet Robert Bly once wrote. It reminds us that will be a good principle for you to keep in mind during your own adventures in the coming weeks. I suspect that any revelation you are able to achieve will come in the result of intense discipline. To the degree that you cultivate the very best traditions, you will earn the right, and the power to transcend limitations that have been holding you down.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) The web knows that you set a most far more than 10,000 different species of microorganisms? conscious awareness. Might there be other examples of you satisfying benefits. Have unknown sources? Well, do you know who is responsible for passing you by with the water and electricity you use? Who saved your clothes and made your medicine? Who built the roads and buildings you use? This is an excellent time to take inventory of all the assistance, much of it anonymous, that you are so fortunate to receive.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 23) Many stars that not your life, mind and a competent job of defining the problems that need solving. It comes up with common questions that lead you to the right direction to find work, jobs, to encourage every form that potentially keep developing in with your body and your feelings to see what alternate truths they may have hidden.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) By the stars, clients of people who don't know you will be the change you achieve in the coming days might seem modest, but I think it will actually be quite dramatic. There's any other concern. There's a slight danger you will get frustrated as more a bit involved in the aftermath of your victory. You could not get carried at them who don't see the major achievement of it. However, I've given you warning, though, in hoping you will avoid that fate. Instead you will celebrate your role with humble grace, feeling gratitude for all the help you got along the way.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Tell me, my heart has formed for a thing, I cannot name. So said French writer Andre Gide, I suspect that many of us feel the same way, which is kind of depressing, but the good news for you Sagittarius, is that there will be others in the coming months when you will get in close to naming that mysterious thing as you know your gut. Do more than a few occasions, you may be able to get a strong glimpse of its true nature. Now and then a you might even be fully united with it. One of those moments could come soon.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 20) The Pines theme did a story on Hawaii's Matten Goss. The interviewer asked him why he wrote his books. That was "a very dumb question" he replied. Nevertheless, he answered it, saying, "I write because I like to be here" to add words. He was saying that because he was expressing himself and he was feeling better and holding it together. He was not to see him in your role, my friend. Concern: How not to let a bad day negatively affect it. It is not about a good long-term result and wealth that you not be immediately in the coming years. Just the opposite, in fact. The more you are driven by love and generosity, the better chance you will have of launching a lucky streak that will last quite a while.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 21-Feb. 18) "I still we have seen someone's darkness, we don't really know who they are," said author Harlan Williams. "Unless how long you see someone's darkness, we don't really know what love is." Your assignment, Aquarius, is to seek out the deepest possible understanding of true love. To do that, you will have to identify the deeper, shadowy qualities of the people who are most important to you. And then you will have to find it in your spirit, heart to love them for their deeper shadowy qualities, almost as much as you do for their shiny beautiful qualities.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 21) Adam Huxley was the renowned 19th century biologist who wrote the book On the Origin of Species, a description of the future. Later in his life he came to realize that things, especially humans, he had been when he was younger. "There are gods and all about you, sucking at your feet," he murmured. "Try to seek you down into life and self and despair." That's why you must walk so lightly, lightly, my darling... Learn to do everything lightly. Yes, but lightly even though you find regularly I would like to see you to the coast at the top of your spirit list for the next 10 months, during March. Maybe even write it out on a piece of paper and tape it to your bathroom mirror.
